Mr. GALLINGER. You can not buy it for that. I had a little experience in making a slight purchase for a man in that section of the city. I did not make any profit out of it; I made a loss. There will be a very slight increase if any increase until the people build their homes there; and the Senator who is so disturbed over the poor people of the District ought to be willing that they should buy land there and build their modest homes and build up that section of the city.

I have no personal pride in this matter; I have no interest in it on the face of the earth, except that I do want to get rid of that wretched hospital, which is a disgrace to civilization, which is a stench in the nostrils of every man who believes in decent living and in decent treatment of the poor people of the country. In view of the fact that this agitation arose against the site that the committee has recommended, and which has been recommended by pretty nearly everybody until very recently, the committee concluded that it would be a good thing for the purpose of giving everybody a fair chance in the matter, if any should think they have not had it—the committee, in what I think was wisdom, have concluded to offer an amendment—or it will be offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who was opposed to locating this hospital at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets—putting it in the hands, as I understand, of the Surgeon General of the Army, of the Surgeon General of the Navy, and the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. I have suggested to the Senator that I think it would be well to add the municipal architect and Mr. Elliott Woods, Superintendent of the Capitol Buildings and Grounds; that those gentlemen should have entire jurisdiction over the subject, and that they should select the site for the hospital. I really hope there will be no serious objection to that solution of this troublesome matter.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] suggested that there was going to be a school building constructed near this reservation. He further suggested that it could be beautified by the planting of trees, and hence separated from the objectionable surroundings on this Government reservation. We have appropriated a large amount of money, and I think the plans are already made for an Eastern High School, which is practically not more than one block from this reservation. The Senator stated that it was two blocks, but it is practically but one block, and there will be probably, after a little while, 900 or 1,000 children in that school. I confess I do not think that they ought to be subjected to disagreeable surroundings, such as will beset them if this new hospital is built on that site. We ought to protect our children. It is more important that we should protect the children than that we should protect the people who own property in any part of the city.

After looking the ground all over, while the committee was unanimous in the view—and I think the entire committee was unanimous in the view—that Fourteenth and Upshur Streets would be an ideal place for this hospital, inasmuch as the Government owns the land and it is fit for hospital purposes, yet the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. SMITH of Maryland], who has a great interest in the District of Columbia, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who certainly has never faltered in looking after the interests of this great District, have all agreed—and there is concurrence on our part at least—that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi would be a fair solution and that no one ought to find fault with the change that is proposed by the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire will remember that in full committee I reserved the right to oppose this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Washington did make a reservation in the committee. I had forgotten that.

I do not want to occupy any more time. I have been working a good many years to get a new municipal hospital, and long before any suggestion was made as to the title that has been given it, for I have been during all of my adult life interested in hospitals and to a very considerable extent in hospital work. I have felt that this was one of the unspeakable blots upon the District of Columbia and that it ought to be remedied as soon as possible. For more than 10 years I have been struggling to do that. We have on two occasions, I think, put an amendment to accomplish that desirable result on the District of Columbia appropriation bill in the Senate, but it was lost in conference. Now we are going to try it again, and I hope the conclusions that the committee has reached, which will be embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, will be accepted by the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senate should vote to retain the present site, it would carry an appropriation which would enable the building of the new hospital on the old site, would it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And the unsightly building to which the Senator from New Hampshire referred will be torn down and a better hospital will be erected upon that site?

Mr. GALLINGER. The old buildings would be torn down. The plans and specifications have already been made under an appropriation provided in the District of Columbia appropriation act of 1915. Those plans are all ready for the building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I started to say a moment ago when I came very near taking the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] off the floor unconsciously, this provision in the pending bill for the Gallinger Municipal Hospital is one of the most valuable things that has been attempted to be done for the District of Columbia in quite a long while. The thing in itself is excellent. The old municipal hospital in reservation 13, out there where the blue spot is on the map [indicating], is in itself a plague spot and is in the midst of a plague spot. Upon the same reservation there stands the jail; there stands the almshouse; there stands the male and female workhouse; and close to it is the old Congressional Cemetery. It goes without saying that that old municipal hospital must be destroyed and something must take its place.

I do not feel that the Congress of the United States is competent to select offhand in open debate on the floor the site for this new hospital. I do feel that the place which has been selected ought to be vacated and ought not to be kept; that is to say, the place at Upshur and Fourteenth Streets. The people there are opposed to it; almost unanimously they do not want it. That is sufficient for me. It is very true that frequently the people of Washington want something, and then when you give it to them they do not know where to put it, and there is a row about it, but these people have not the right of self-government, except in a very limited degree by way of petition and by way of making their wishes known to Members of the Senate and Members of the other House.

Not only is this hospital a good thing in itself, Mr. President, but I, for one, am very glad that it is going to be called the "Gallinger Municipal Hospital." It is not to my credit to say it; it is merely the truth, that no man has done more for the District of Columbia than has the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will not say that he has done more than anybody else, but certainly nobody has done more for its beautification and especially for its sanitation; and this will be a memorial to him, a monument to his memory that will always be here and will be very much more enduring than a shaft of marble or something of that sort. So that I want the thing itself; I want the name; but I do not want the Fourteenth and Upshur Streets site; I do not want it because the people there do not want it; and I do not want it for a great many other reasons, some of which are expressed in an article written to the Times by Mr. Newman, who is known popularly as "Savoyard," the reading of which I request at the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CITES SEVERAL REASONS FOR PROTEST AGAINST MUNICIPAL HOSPITAL AT FOURTEENTH AND UPSHUR STREETS.

To the EDITOR OF THE TIMES:

The District appropriation bill as reported to the United States Senate contains a paragraph carrying $150,000 for the proposed Gallinger (municipal) Hospital, to be located at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets NW. That this town is sorely in need of such an institution no one denies; but in the opinion of a large number of very worthy and intelligent citizens the location of it at the place designated is bad husbandry in many respects.

The patients of this hospital are entitled to some consideration. A large majority of them dwell in South Washington. The proposed location is in far North Washington. The patients, a great majority of them, are very poor, and it is proposed to put on them the hardship of travelling clear across the city to be treated for disease, and it is only truth to say that in numerous cases their maladies are due to their own habits.

They are unfortunate and entitled to the sympathy of all of us. I have little patience with the charity that prates of "the worthy poor." The mission of Christ was to succor the unworthy. As for that matter the unworthy poor are better than the unworthy rich.

But that aside. Is it the intention of Congress to promote the spread of contagious diseases in this town? To reach this proposed hospital patients will be necessitated to travel on the Fourteenth Street cars. That line carries as many passengers as any other in the city, and if the paragraph of this bill I cite becomes a law, every passenger on a Fourteenth Street car every day will be exposed to the danger of infection.

It is insisted that many years ago the proposed site of this hospital was purchased for the purpose of locating the municipal hospital thereon; but at that time there was scarcely a dwelling on Fourteenth north of Park Road. Now that part of the town is built up and thickly settled. The houses are new. Very few of them are rented. Nearly all are occupied by their owners. Not one of the present residents ever dreamed that this hospital was to be located at the proposed site, else that part of Fourteenth Street would be vacant lots.

Locate this hospital there and the market value of hundreds of residences will be depreciated enormously, while the assessed value for taxation will remain the same. It is partial confiscation, and I appeal to the sense of justice of the Senate to strike the paragraph out, or, better, erect the building on the site of the present municipal hospital, where it has been for more than 70 years.

Suppose Fourteenth Street at Spring Road was as splendidly improved as Dupont Circle. Nobody would dream of locating this hospital at Fourteenth and Upshur. If contiguous to the site there was an estate like Friendship, there would be no room for the Gallinger Hospital. If Fourteenth Street were lined with palaces, as is Sixteenth Street, who could imagine a municipal hospital located thereon?

Nobody on Fourteenth Street is very rich or very poor; but all of us feel that it is an outrage as well as a hardship to impose this burden on us.

Another thing: The cost of this hospital is limited to $500,000; that is, for the building. But in depreciation of real estate values on Fourteenth Street and in the Piney Branch region an additional charge of $1,000,000 must be added. That, however, is borne by individuals, not the Treasury.

Why not keep the hospital where it is? There it is convenient to the patients.

WASHINGTON, July 21.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is one among very many letters that I have received and newspaper articles I have read protesting against the site of this hospital being at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets. I do not pretend that some of the people who are protesting against it have not in their own minds exaggerated the depreciation of the property values that might be brought about by the location of the hospital at that place. That is but a natural thing. Nor have I the slightest idea that there is any real estate den floating around about reservation No. 13. The idea that anybody would go in and buy property around reservation No. 13 with a notion that it was going to increase in value very much and they were going to grow rich by it as long as the jail is kept there and as long as the almshouse is kept there and as long as the two workhouses are kept there strikes me as somewhat far-fetched. In all matters of this sort people on one side and people on the other side permit themselves in the enforcement of their own opinions somewhat to exaggerate the anticipated consequences, but it would decrease to some extent the valuation of property at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets, where many homes have been built, and I do not think it is quite a fair thing to do.

At the same time, I realize that there is neither time nor information nor inclination upon the part of the Senate to select a site, and I have therefore drawn up and have submitted to the chairman of the committee and to as many of the members of the committee as I could reach this substitute for the provision in the bill: Strike out the present provision and substitute a new provision, so as to read:

Gallinger Municipal Hospital: Toward the construction of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital, on a site to be selected by a commission—

I want the attention of the Senator from Maryland, because I think he has a wrong idea as to the members of the commission—constituted of the Surgeon General of the Army, the Surgeon General of the Navy, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the municipal architect, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, in accordance with plans and specifications prepared under the authority contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915, $150,000, and the limit of cost of the construction of said hospital and accessory buildings is hereby fixed at $500,000.

There is no change in those particulars; the amendment reads the same in those respects as the provision in the bill—

Provided, That the conclusion reached by said commission on the question of location of said hospital shall be final and conclusive.

I put that in because I think the Senate and the Congress are tired of this discussion as to a site in connection with this matter, and almost everything else that is proposed. The language I am about to read in the amendment is the same as that in the bill now—

Provided, further, That said hospital shall be constructed with a view to making future additions if the exigencies shall demand and the provision—contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for 1915, which provides that the hospital shall be located and erected on the site now owned by the District of Columbia at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets is hereby repealed.

That leaves this board freedom to select a site wherever the board may think best; and I have selected the board with a view of having men who are experts upon sanitation, and have added to them a couple of engineers, because it is a sanitation and an engineering problem almost entirely; and I have tried to bring in the local interest of the District itself by putting upon the board the District architect.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to permit this board to select any other sites than the two which have been mentioned?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any site.

Mr. JONES. In other words, they can recommend the purchase of additional land for the site if they see fit to do so?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have the whole city of Washington to look over and to select what they regard as the best site. Of course, they will act as men of common sense, and if they find property already owned by the Government as good or nearly as good for the purpose as property that would have to be bought, they would recommend that. They are men of fine sense.

Mr. JONES. But, of course, they would simply make a recommendation to Congress in case they selected some site other than one of those to which reference has been made?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They could not bind Congress, and undoubtedly they could not buy any property. The constitutional provision that prevents money from being paid out of the Treasury except by act of Congress would prevent that.

Mr. JONES. Well, I know; but I did not know but that under the language of the amendment the Senator proposes they could agree that the hospital should be located here, and then it would be up to Congress to appropriate the money.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Their decision will be conclusive so far as they have power to make anything conclusive and so far as I can make it so; but, of course, they can not appropriate money out of the Treasury. That goes without saying.

Mr. JONES. I understand that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds is included in this commission?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Col. Harts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; Elliott Woods.

Mr. NEWLANDS. He is the Superintendent of the Capitol. Would the Senator have any objection to inserting there the name of Col. Harts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would have inserted it there, but I understood that Col. Harts had committed himself positively in favor of the Fourteenth and Upshur Streets site, and I did not want anybody on the commission that I knew had committed himself. I heard that; I do not know how true it is, but I do not want a packed jury.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the selection of a site for a hospital of the kind in contemplation is of course a difficult matter. I believe it is conceded that a new hospital ought to be built; that the District is sorely in need of it; and that if a location is to be selected for it, taking into consideration the nature of the inmates, it necessarily will be objected to by everybody living in the vicinity of that location; and yet, of course, the hospital being necessary, a location is likewise necessary, and it must be located somewhere. We ought to locate it, it seems to me, where it will meet with the least objection, taking into consideration, of course, the welfare of those who are so unfortunate as to be inmates.

The proposed location out on Fourteenth Street is in a neighborhood fairly well settled up by people of moderate means, most of whom own their homes or will own them when they pay off the mortgages. They purchased their homes and built their homes, it is true, in the face of a law that provided that the Washington Asylum Hospital should be located up there on ground owned by the Government. As I understand it, that is a statute that has been on the statute books for several years; but I presume not one of those people when they bought lots and built or bought houses that were already built knew of the existence of such a law. The real estate men who sold property up there, of course, did not call the attention of purchasers to the fact that they were buying property in the vicinity of such a hospital. So that these people have honestly located and built up quite a large section of Washington in that vicinity with homes and with a settlement of good people. It would be, it seems to me, a hardship if this hospital were to be located there; and yet I concede that if there were no other place better it ought to be located there, even though it brought on loss and hardship, because, as I said at the beginning, it must be located somewhere.

But now we are confronted with the other proposition that this hospital has been located on reservation 13, its present location, for a great many years—I think some one said 70 years—so that at least no one now living has been kept in ignorance of its existence if he were contemplating the purchase of property in that vicinity or building a home there for himself and family. If the hospital is built on its present location, therefore, it will not be injurious or harmful, as far as I am able to see, to anyone who has invested in property or built a home in ignorance of the fact that such a hospital was in the vicinity of his contemplated residence.

Mr. President, what kind of people are treated in this hospital? I have here a little pamphlet that I presume was sent to all the Senators, entitled "A Protest Against the Removal of the Washington Asylum Hospital to the Fourteenth Street Site." It is signed by several citizens' associations, and about the only way in which the people of Washington can present their views to Congress is by a protest similar to this. I was impressed with it, because they concede that the hospital is necessary, and that it must be located somewhere; but they give reasons that to me seem sufficient for building the hospital in its present location.

This protest is signed by the Piney Branch Citizens' Association, by the Brightwood Citizens' Association, by the Brightwood Park Citizens' Association, by the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association, by the Petworth Citizens' Association, by the Park View Citizens' Association, by the Takoma Park Citizens' Association, by the Woodburn and Chillum Castle Heights Citizens' Association, by the Board of Trade, by the Chamber of Commerce, and by the Federation of Citizens' Associations. Quoting from the report of the Board of Charities for 1914, they call attention to the character of patients that this hospital treats. I quote from this protest:

As pointed out in previous reports, the population of Washington Asylum is made up of those patients which are not acceptable to other institutions. They consist largely of patients suffering from chronic and specific diseases and in considerable part of inebriates and suspected insane persons. They also comprise sick prisoners from the jail and persons held by the police. Many of the chronic patients are incontinent and dirty and require the most untiring effort to keep them in clean and wholesome condition.

In that year there were treated in this hospital 3,103 patients. There were 942 colored male patients, 564 colored female patients, 1,175 white male patients, and 422 white female patients. During that year—taken from this same report of the Board of Charities—the following diseases were treated:

Acute alcoholism, 437.
Delirium tremens, 80.
Chronic alcoholism, 62.
Morphinism, 51.
Scabies, 11.
Venereal diseases, 165.
Pellagra, 9.
Mental diseases, 580.

The report in another place uses this language:

Of the 3,103 patients admitted during the year, 1,736 were received on permits issued by the Board of Charities, 583 were brought in by the police, 294 were transferred from the District Jail, and 86 were admitted through the superintendent of the hospital. The emergency cases numbered 244. Nearly all of those brought in by the police department were either mental suspects or victims of alcohol or morphine.

Mr. President, the jail is located in the vicinity of the present site of the hospital. You will notice from that report that a large number of patients are transferred from the jail to the asylum, and I presume it often happens that patients are transferred from the asylum to the jail. It seems to me that one thing in favor of its location there is its proximity to the jail. It would make it unnecessary to carry these patients of an objectionable kind going to the jail across the city of Washington, which would have to be done if the hospital were located clear up on north Fourteenth Street.

Now, I want to read another short extract from that report:

The ward which is the largest and most important unit in the hospital is known as the psychopathic ward, which cares for the mental subjects, alcoholics, and dope fiends. Last year we had 573 mental cases, of which 267, after careful examination and treatment, were transferred to the Government Hospital for the Insane.

Another reason why it ought to be located in its present situation is because a large number of its patients are transferred from there to the Hospital for the Insane, and if it were located where it is now it would be unnecessary to carry those patients through the entire city of Washington, as would have to be done, if the hospital were located on north Fourteenth Street.

Reading further from this same report in regard to this same ward:

In this ward we also treated 569 alcoholics, and many addicted to the cocaine habit.

Now, Senators, note this: This is part of the official report referring to the character of the patients. Note it carefully. It seems to me it ought to have an important bearing upon the location of this hospital:

Many of the mental cases in the acute stages are so noisy, unruly, and profane that they disturb patients even in the buildings far removed.

Mr. President, it does not seem to me that with that kind of a record Congress ought to impose upon these citizens out on north Fourteenth Street what we would be imposing upon them, in my judgment, if we located this hospital there. It seems to me, too, that it would not be wise to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, which leaves the matter to a board. They will report back to Congress, and we will have to determine eventually where this hospital must be located. They would not be able to locate it. They would make a report, and if they located this hospital in any section of the city where there were people living they certainly would protest, as these people living in the vicinity where it is proposed to locate it now are protesting.

I think we ought to bear in mind the fact that those who are objecting to this location on Fourteenth Street are not objecting to the building of this hospital. As far as I am concerned, I feel just as much in favor of the construction of this hospital as anyone else can. It is our duty to provide for its construction; but it seems to me that it would be a matter of economy if we located the hospital on its present site, and that it would injure a great many people, would be a source of great expense, and would be a source of large damage to all the people living in this vicinity if it were located on north Fourteenth Street or any other residential section of the city of Washington.

The place where it has existed always is the only place, it seems to me, where those objections do not apply. In view of the fact that it has existed for 70 years, there could be, as I see it, no objection from residents, at least in that vicinity, to its location there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I concur very fully with the views which have been expressed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. I am not aware of the objections that exist to the location of the hospital on the present site. I think it would be most objectionable to place it upon Fourteenth Street. The Senator in charge of the bill states that the committee intends to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi. If that course is taken, I think it should be with the understanding that the Senate is against—and, I hope, unalterably against—placing this hospital on Fourteenth Street.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if that is true—and I understand it is—why not say so in this amendment and not leave it to the commission to put it there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was just going a little further to say that if we are unalterably against placing it there, we might as well relieve that property at once from the cloud that hangs over it by the mere threat.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me a minute, I think we might just as well adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE], and locate this hospital where it is now.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that that is the pending amendment.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The pending amendment is an amendment providing for building this hospital on reservation 13. It simply corrects the committee amendment so as to specify reservation 13 as the place where it shall be built.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, locating the hospital at its present place, unless some reason is given that I do not now know.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, is not this a valid reason—that they are just commencing the construction of a new Eastern High School within a block of that reservation, where they will have from 700 to 800 children, and perhaps 1,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I voted against its construction there. I thought it was simply inexcusable to put that high school there.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it is there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are responsible, I think, for that blunder. I do think we ought to say to this commission that we do not intend to approve a hospital on Fourteenth Street at the site indicated, and let the property owners there at once be freed from that threat.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will ask the Senator if he has heard the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi? If not, will he do me the kindness to read it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be glad to hear it read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

Gallinger Municipal Hospital: Toward the construction of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital on a site to be selected by a commission constituted of the Surgeon General of the Army, the Surgeon General of the Navy, the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, the municipal architect, and the Superintendent of the Capital Buildings and Grounds, in accordance with plans and specifications prepared under the authority contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915, $150,000; and the limit of cost of the construction of said hospital and accessory buildings is hereby fixed at $500,000: Provided, That the conclusion reached by said commission on the question of location of said hospital shall be final and conclusive: Provided further, That said hospital shall be constructed with a view to making future additions if the exigencies shall demand, and the provision contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for 1915 which provides that the hospital shall be located and erected on the site now owned by the District of Columbia at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets is hereby repealed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It repeals the appropriation which now locates it on Fourteenth Street and leaves this commission the privilege of putting it there. Mr. President, I am not willing to vote for any proposition that leaves this commission the privilege of putting the hospital on Fourteenth Street. I could not vote for any appropriation to put the hospital there. I think we ought at once to give the people there an indication that we do not intend to place the hospital in the midst of their homes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator from Georgia visited the site?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and I have talked with some of the people who live in the neighborhood.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, the Senator knows that hospitals in all the great cities of the country are located in residence districts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But this hospital, according to the information given us by the Senator from Nebraska, is not an ordinary hospital. I have visited the present hospital, and I have been impressed with the fact that the character of diseases treated at the hospital are of an extreme nature.

Mr. GALLINGER. But would not the Senator from Georgia be willing to leave it to a commission such as is suggested in the amendment? Dr. Gorgas, at the head of the health service of the Navy Department, has had great experience in hospital work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if there is any other reason, except the location of this school, that would make the present site objectionable.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. That reservation was intended as a park for the people of the eastern part of the city, and it never ought to have been used for any other purpose. They have no other park in the eastern part of the city. It is intended at some time to get rid of those objectionable buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How long has the hospital been there?

Mr. GALLINGER. For 70 years, more or less. It has been there a very long time. But, Mr. President, it does seem to me the Senator from Georgia should be willing to have this distinguished commission, all of whom have knowledge of hospital work and hospital building, to look this District over and select a site. There are a great many other places where a hospital may be put. We might have to buy the land, possibly, but I can think now of two or three other eligible sites. I should be willing, if I had a pecuniary interest in this matter or any other interest, to leave it with this commission. I can not conceive that they would make a mistake.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I am told, without being fully advised as to the attitude of all of the members of the proposed commission, that one of the gentlemen has already expressed himself as favoring the Fourteenth Street site.

Mr. GALLINGER. Suppose he had; there are four others. Mr. President, we have been met with that. Every time that the committee undertook to suggest somebody for this work, the objection has come that they are committed. We do not know that they are committed. The committee has no knowledge of that, and I do not believe there is a single one of them who did commit himself.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. If the Senator will permit me, the committee is not urging it, and when they find this opposition to the hospital location there it is highly probable that they would not locate it there after the committee amendment had been rejected. Aside from that, does not the Senator from Georgia feel that it would be better to look over the various places that may be suitable for a hospital in the city of Washington and determine it rather than let it be settled in the Senate to-day that there is but one suitable place for the hospital that should be selected?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In reply I should like to ask the Senator whether this appropriation of $150,000 is for the purchase of land?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is for the building exclusively.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The $150,000 is toward the erection of the building?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The building.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The commission are given the power to locate the hospital, and it does seem to me that it is better for the District to allow more than one place which may be selected.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Have the members of the committee inspected the proposed location?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Yes, sir; I have been on the ground.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the members of the committee are just as capable of selecting the location as the commission which it is proposed to be created by the amendment. Really, I have not much faith in commissions, generally. I think it very much better for the Congress to do these things when it is possible for it to do so.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator will permit me, I think I can make a suggestion which will satisfy the Senator from Georgia and perhaps everybody.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I always yield for that purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The substantial effect of the amendment now proposed really excludes the Fourteenth Street site. The committee would be willing to have that language made clear and have it excluded by the terms of the amendment. If the Senator from Georgia has the amendment before him and wishes to change that language so as to exclude the site at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets it will be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The committee certainly has but one object in view, and that is to get the best location that can be obtained. We do not think that end will be subserved if we decide that only one location shall be selected.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I wish to discuss this matter a little further on the general merits. In the first place, the Senator from New Hampshire has objected to this location primarily because a school is to be put within one square of this objectionable hospital, as he describes it. That school, he says, is to have 800 pupils in it. The Senator from New Hampshire thought it would be objectionable to have 800 grown-up pupils within a square of this hospital as it now exists; he considered that hospital so objectionable; and yet, condemning him out of his own mouth and on his own argument, he is willing to put this hospital up against 20 squares of homes, with all sorts of little children within those homes. I have here photographs of the Fourth of July children's celebration in one of the subdivisions abutting on this proposed site, in which there are shown 750 little children.

Mr. GALLINGER. How far is that from the proposed site?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is exactly across the street from it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think so.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. There are 750 little children shown as belonging in just one of the segments abutting on the proposed site. The Senator considers it to be objectionable, and his admission settles the whole question that it is objectionable, for this hospital to be kept within a square of a high school to be used by children 14 years old and upward.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I trust that some suggestion will satisfy the Senator from Maryland. If the committee agrees to exclude this site at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets, will that satisfy the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I offer this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one moment. Will that satisfy the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to offer this amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi right at the close:

That the location of said hospital upon Fourteenth and Upshur Streets is hereby forbidden.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. So far so good; but what next place will be suggested? There were no bowels of compassion shown for the 3,000 homes that we have mentioned. Why turn this proposition loose, Mr. President? There it has been for 70 years. There is where the real estate values have adjusted themselves. There is where there are now 50 acres without the jail, 70 acres with the jail, and 100 acres with the reclaimed land. The Senator from New Hampshire just now said that there was no park area for the eastern part of the city. There have been appropriations made for the reclamation of the entire Anacostia Flats, with sea walls to be constructed and filling in to go on, just as in the Potomac Park. So there will be a park there of hundreds of acres available, if the Senate wants it to be available.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows that it will be a very narrow strip.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. On the contrary—

Mr. GALLINGER. And to get to that park people will have to pass the buildings which are there now, the Smallpox Hospital and the crematory.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. They may go around through Maryland somewhere.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Not at all. It is easily and directly accessible, and all the way up and down Anacostia River, on both sides, there will be several hundred acres available for park purposes. I have been there, and I have seen it, and I know. Particularly on the eastern side the average width is probably a thousand feet running all the way up and down the river. It has been a very extensive improvement, and there is no reason why those people should not get the benefit of that park development, rather than that this real estate boom should come in and the prices should be so enhanced that the colored population especially can not stay where they are located, but will have to move out because of the high prices and the high taxation. It comes very inconsistently from the Senator from New Hampshire, who should be willing to let those people live somewhere, I suppose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I have been. And I will say to the Senator that is not an exclusively colored community. There are a great many white people living there.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. My information is that the space within the 6,000-foot circle from the reservation is inhabited almost exclusively by colored people. Of course, there may be other areas not that way.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a scattered population, and they ought to have some place to go. I do not see that that is going to affect those people at all.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. This very extreme degree of improvement that the Senator mentions is inconsistent. Give them streets, give them sewers and sidewalks, and give them a chance to have reasonably cheap homes. That is what they ought to have.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I have been trying to get for 30 years.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. But as to throwing reservation 13 away for its present public purposes, with a hundred acres available land and over a quarter of a million of dollars in available buildings there already, not in the least touched by the extension of Massachusetts Avenue, that is going very far. I admire the Senator's candid discussion of this question. The very fact that he joins us here in the debate candidly, man to man on this subject, shows good feeling on his part and good feeling all around. But to a certain extent the minds of his old associates here in the Senate have probably been affected by his attitude on this question.

I do not think, Mr. President, that this commission which has been suggested, a commission entirely of Federal employees, is a proper commission to settle this question, and one of the members already, I am recently informed, has settled the question against the Fourteenth Street home owners.

Mr. GALLINGER. Two of the commissioners, if the Senator will permit me, are employees of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. One of them is a United States officer, I believe, a Federal employee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Hardly that.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Suppose I came along with a counter proposition and suggested the president of the chamber of commerce, the president of the board of trade, the president of the Federation of Citizens' Associations of the District of Columbia should settle this question. That would be local—

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the Senator's privilege.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I am inclined to think it would be a fairer proposition than for these three Senators, who are very much interested in this proposition, with all their great influence, to come in and suggest a list of gentlemen who are all Federal employees and who are more or less influenced by the amenities of the official situation to settle this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Maryland does not mean to impugn the motives or integrity of the committee, I apprehend.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I will not go that far, but I do not believe these gentlemen, these Federal officials, ought to be put up against such a situation.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The committee did not suggest it. It was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. We had nothing to do with their names.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. But it is acceptable to the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me one word, and then I am done? The Senator calls attention to the fact that certain buildings in this reservation could easily be converted into a hospital. Some years ago I had a resolution passed through the Senate asking the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds to investigate that matter, and he investigated it and reported that those buildings could not be changed so as to be made applicable for hospital purposes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The opinion still prevails that they are good, substantial buildings, and it would require very little expense to add to them to make them great hospital wards. However that may be, there ought not to be any delay about this proposition. The Gallinger Hospital ought to be erected promptly. It is needed in this city, and it is a just tribute to the Senator whose name it will bear, but this question of the site ought to be left undisturbed. I claim that after a matter of this kind has been adjusted by usage for 70 years, there is a burden of proof on the shoulders of the committee and the Senator from New Hampshire himself that they have not borne in this argument. It is a very serious thing to come in here and upset this adjustment that has existed so long.

Mr. GALLINGER. The workhouse was on that same site for 70 years, but it has been removed.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It was removed to the country, and it was a very good move to put the workhouse in the country, because enough farm lands were secured to occupy the inmates of that institution. That is exactly the reverse of what the Senator proposes this time. He proposes to remove this institution from a 70-acre place to a 30-acre place.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire, but the Senator from New Hampshire has agreed that the location of that site shall be forbidden by law. So I do not think the Senator—

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Now, where are you going to put it? There is no appropriation for this site. Are you going to put it in Rock Creek Park? Are you going to put it in the Zoo, or are you going to put it in the Mall? Where are you going to put it? Why not leave it where it is without interfering with any other rights of any body of citizens in this District?

This matter has been long adjusted—I may say, adjusted for three-quarters of a century. Why change it? I can realize,

Mr. President, that the sum of money that I have mentioned as going into the pockets of the real estate owners within a circle 6,000 feet in diameter, $580,000, is a very small part of the profits that would accrue to the large real estate owners of that section if these unsightly buildings were altogether removed.

I do not believe the Senator from New Hampshire is in the slightest degree mixed up with that idea; I think the committee are innocent on that subject, and they can not see the immense motive power that has been behind this proposition all the time. Mr. President, when you come to upset an adjustment of 70 years by the location of institutions of this sort the burden of proof is upon the proposer of the proposition, and I submit they have not borne that burden of proof or shown any substantial reasons. In fact, the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire is that it will not do to put 14-year-old school children within a block of this hospital by reason of the character of the hospital, and that very argument coming out of the mouth of this learned physician, the Senator from New Hampshire, is enough expert testimony to settle this whole question right here in the Senate. He should be unwilling to put the children of 20 squares up against this very institution, or the children of some other 20 squares somewhere else in the District of Columbia.

This original place is ideal. There is the river on one side and the river on the other side, and the Congressional Cemetery on a remaining side, leaving only nine blocks habitable by human beings touching this reservation.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Maryland probably has a better knowledge of the real-estate valuation and the real-estate situation than I have. Does he really entertain the opinion that with the Congressional Cemetery there, with the jail there, with the Smallpox Hospital there, and with the crematory there there will be a tremendous advance in real-estate values?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, if the influence exists to-day that can destroy or abandon over $200,000 of available structures there now, and can use property not necessary to be used much more in value; if that power exists to-day it will move the jail in a few years and throw away, also, that $500,000 improvement.

The truth of the matter is, Mr. President, that neither Massachusetts Avenue nor any other street in the neighborhood would be interfered with at all by the use of this large reservation for this proper municipal purpose; and it would leave available a type of cheap property that ought to be left available for a certain citizenry of the District of Columbia, a citizenry for which the Senator has always professed a kindness of a political nature; but when it comes down to treating the colored people with a reasonable amount of humane consideration, the southern Senator really will stand by them better than some of their northern political friends.

The question before the Senate, as I understand, is on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. [Putting the question.]

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we had better have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED. Making the same transfer that I did on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

So the amendment of Mr. LEE of Maryland was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk. I understand that while I was out of the Chamber the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] suggested a modification of the amendment which meets with the approval of the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee [Mr. SMITH of Maryland] and of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia]. I have no objection to the modification. I therefore offer my amendment as modified by the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as now modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment as proposed by the committee and printed in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

Gallinger Municipal Hospital: Toward the construction of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital on a site to be selected by a commission constituted of the Surgeon General of the Army, the Surgeon General of the Navy, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the Municipal Architect, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Buildings and Grounds in accordance with plans and specifications prepared under the authority contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915, $150,000, and the limit of cost of the construction of said hospital and accessory buildings is hereby fixed at $500,000: Provided, That the conclusion reached by said commission on the question of location of said hospital shall be final and conclusive: Provided further, That said hospital shall be constructed with a view to making future additions if the exigencies shall demand and the provision contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for 1915, which provides that the hospital shall be located and erected on the site now owned by the District of Columbia at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets, is hereby repealed; and the location of said hospital upon the Fourteenth and Upshur Streets site is hereby forbidden.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, speaking for the committee, I desire to say that we offer no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me to make a report from a committee?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I yield.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY FLOOD.

Mr. OVERMAN. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi, and for other purposes, without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have not agreed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think there will be any debate on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I wish merely to make a few observations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the District of Columbia appropriation bill to be laid aside?

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the joint resolution be considered by unanimous consent, Mr. President. It will not lead to debate, and unanimous consent, I understand, has been given.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. My understanding was that this was an emergency measure, and that there would be no debate upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think there will be no debate. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] states that he will take but a few moments.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take not more than five or six minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to appropriate $540,000 for the relief of persons suffering and in destitution by reason of recent floods in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi; and authorizes the Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to expend so much of that sum as he may deem necessary in supplying such seeds as may be suitable to produce quick-growing crops to provide food for the population and animals of the flood areas; and to supply the destitute with some form of employment at a moderate rate of pay, such employment to be under the supervision of Army officers and in cooperation with local officials; and the Secretary of War is also authorized to furnish such supplies of the Quartermaster and Medical Departments as he may deem proper, to those who are destitute and unable to work, but for a period not exceeding 90 days from the passage of this resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know just how the people of my State who have lost all their crops from frost this year will feel when they learn of such appropriations as this passing through Congress for the relief of those who have lost property through floods. We have a number of counties in the State of Utah which produce fruit as their principle means of support. Thousands of carloads of fruit usually leave those counties every year for all parts of the United States. Two years ago the crop was a total failure; one year ago it was nearly a failure; while this year they will have hardly enough fruit for the people in the counties in which our fruit districts are located. These three years, Mr. President, have been very hard upon those people; in fact, many of them have had to be assisted.

Mr. President, I have never felt that it was my duty as a Senator to offer bills for the relief of the people in my State who have suffered from such conditions as I have stated. I do not think that the people of Utah have felt that it was the duty of their Senator to do so, or that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to make good their loss, unfortunate as the loss was.

I say this at this time so that if the question ever arises hereafter the people of Utah will know that I did not think it my duty as a Senator to ask for relief for them. I consider the State should do so. I have never yet received a petition from a citizen of Utah to introduce such a measure, and I never expect to receive it.

I am not, however, going to stand in the way of the passage of this joint resolution. If the Senate of the United States feel that the Government ought to make an appropriation for the purposes named, let the responsibility rest upon it. So far as I am concerned, I want to say that I believe it should not be done. With this brief explanation, I shall have nothing more to say in relation to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I move to amend the joint resolution by inserting, after the word "Florida," on page 1, in line 7, the name "Tennessee."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am somewhat acquainted with east Tennessee, and I know that the same floods which so devastated western North Carolina have had a very destructive effect in east Tennessee. Therefore, while I am not authorized by the committee to accept the amendment, so far as I am concerned, I accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Tennessee, and Mississippi, and for other purposes."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator that there are some matters here that the committee offers which have not yet been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are not yet disposed of.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well.

The SECRETARY. The only other amendment of the committee passed over is to be found on page 111 and has reference to the purchase of the so-called Dean tract. On page 111, beginning with line 17, the committee proposes to insert the following:

For the acquisition for a public park of the tract of land known as the "Dean tract," assessed on the records of the assessor of the District of Columbia as lots A, 818 and 819, in square 2535, containing 404,425 square feet, more or less, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $625,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment so as to perfect that provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary, then, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. No; it is not necessary to reconsider it. It will be found, when the amendment is stated, that it is not necessary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the committee amendment, the following words:

Provided, That the said lands when acquired shall be a part of the park system of the District of Columbia, subject to the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1898. (30 Stats., ch. 543.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is clearly an amendment to the amendment. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment which is to be acted upon in the same manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 111, line 16, after the numerals "$500,000," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the said lands when acquired shall be a part of the park system of the District of Columbia, subject to the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1898 (30 Stat., ch. 543).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge—

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah was recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I just want to call attention to the fact that the amendment as announced would go to the Patterson tract, and not the Dean tract, as I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It applies to the Patterson tract and puts it under the control of the Chief of Engineers, instead of leaving it entirely to the District Commissioners.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before that is acted upon, I want to ask the Senator a question. I thought that his amendment referred to the Dean tract rather than the Patterson tract, but I want the information, anyhow.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The first one did.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I know the first one did. In the purchase of the Dean tract the amount, I believe, was $625,000.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Six hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the District pay half of it and the General Government pay half of it?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is under the half-and-half system; yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. What I wanted also to learn, if possible, is this: Will the District assess benefits for the payment of one-half of the cost of the Dean tract?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. There is no provision for that, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see why the Dean tract should not be purchased and benefits assessed the same as in the case of other purchases by the Government and opening of streets, and so forth. I should like to know why it should be differentiated from the general practice in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is only a matter of purchasing this property. I do not know what future developments may bring forth in the way of assessments.

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has an amendment to offer to increase the amount of the appropriation for the purpose of buying a piece of property facing on Connecticut Avenue, so as to extend the Zoological Park to Connecticut Avenue. When the first appropriation was made for the purchase of that piece of property I had no idea that there would be benefits assessed against so-called adjacent property for the purchase of it; but after Congress made the appropriation the property owners on Connecticut Avenue—

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, I do not think there is any law or any custom providing for assessing benefits when land is purchased. I have never known an instance of that sort.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had to pay the assessments, he would think otherwise.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On a straight purchase, when the Government buys land and then goes into an assessment of benefits to other people?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is no law in existence that authorizes it, and there is no such practice in the District of Columbia, in my opinion. I have never known an instance of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me tell the Senator of an instance. The appropriation was made for the purchase of this very land that the Senator from Missouri is undertaking now to have appropriated for in this bill, but it went out in conference. I know that I received a notice of an assessment against my property, nearly a mile away, for the purpose of paying for that property. Whether the Senator knows it or not, that is the case.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, of course I do not controvert the statement made by the Senator from Utah, but my impression has been that when we purchased property outright there were no assessments, but that if it was condemned the benefits were taken into consideration. Now, the provisions of this bill for these two tracts name the sums of money appropriated to purchase the property. I feel sure that when the Meridian Hill Park was acquired, which was a direct purchase, there were no assessments for benefits upon adjoining property.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the original amendment offered to the District bill for the purpose of purchasing the land to which I have referred; but the Senator from Missouri—

Mr. STONE. I have them here.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that the Senator from Nebraska received a notice of an intended assessment for the purchase of this land.

Mr. STONE. There were benefit assessments.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I have a list of them here.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I was sure of it. Another case, I will say to the Senator, if he does not know it, was the opening of Nineteenth Street. Now, Nineteenth Street was opened, and assessments were made against the property on Connecticut Avenue; but I think that if I lived here a thousand years I would never use Nineteenth Street. It may have been condemned or it may have been purchased; I can not say.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator from Utah, however, that while it is true that the commissioners appointed by the court to value the land which was to be taken over under the former appropriation of one hundred and seven thousand odd dollars assessed benefits to adjacent properties, the owners of the properties who would have been obliged to pay the benefits protested in court, and on appeal the upper court set aside the assessment of benefits. I have not looked into the decisions; I have not felt sufficiently interested to take that trouble; but Dr. Walcott, the secretary of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, writes me a letter which I have here, in which he states, as I recall it, that the court set aside the assessment on account of benefits against adjacent property on the ground that the court appointing the commissioners and giving the directions had committed some error in the order made by that court. Dr. Walcott calls my attention to what he says is a fact, that these benefits can be reassessed in accordance with the ruling of the court as it now stands, and that whenever the reassessment is made and the assessments collected they will be covered into the Treasury and will reduce the appropriation to that extent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understood, Mr. President; and if the assessment made really benefited the property that was assessed there would be no objection. But take the property on Connecticut Avenue and Calvert Street. There is no more benefit to that property by the purchase of this piece of land than there is to the man who lives on North Capitol Street or any other part of the city of Washington. I believe that the piece of property ought to be purchased for the park.

Mr. STONE. The Senator means the piece of property which I am trying to have acquired.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I certainly do. I think it ought to be purchased; but I do not believe that a few people living within 1 mile of it ought to be compelled to pay for the property when it will be used by everyone in the District.

Mr. STONE. Of course, the Senator from Utah is mistaken about saying that his home is a mile, or anything like a mile, away from the property which is to be acquired under this appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. That property is north of what is called the buffalo wallow, where the buffalos are housed to-day, is it not?

Mr. STONE. It extends from Cathedral Avenue to Klinge Road.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. And Cathedral Avenue is about two blocks—not more than that—from the Senator's house on Connecticut Avenue.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how far north it extends, except that it extended beyond where the buffalo are kept now.

Mr. STONE. The Senator knows where the bridge over the ravine is?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Just beyond the opening from Connecticut Avenue to the park. Now, Klinge Road runs under that bridge.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is as I understood it, and I think that is beyond where the buffalo are kept. That is as I understand it, and that is nearly 1 mile away.

Mr. STONE. It is very nearly 1 mile away counting from the Senator's house to the north end of this piece of property.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not speak of my property any more than I do other properties involved. That is not the question. I am perfectly willing to pay any reasonable and just tax; but I do believe that the system that exists in the District of Columbia of assessing benefits to property when there are no benefits ought to cease, and the law ought to be repealed. As I stated, as far as any benefit to the property is concerned, anywhere on Connecticut Avenue or anywhere on Calvert Street—

Mr. STONE. It is of no benefit to the Senator's property.

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever; and yet there will be an assessment made, but it will not be made if the property happens to fall just outside the circle agreed upon; but if it happens to fall within the circle that is agreed upon, then the property is assessed. I know one case where a neighbor's property, in making the circle, fell outside, and the house adjoining it happened to come within the circle, and the latter had to pay assessments for benefits. Such things as that are not just and are not right.

Mr. STONE. What is the Senator trying to accomplish by his discourse?

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to find out whether the $625,000 appropriation made for the Dean tract was to be paid for by assessment of benefits, the same as the property in regard to which the Senator is interested, and which he will offer an amendment to cover.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. We have made no provision for an assessment in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there is no such provision in this bill; but I thought the Senator would know whether or not, under the existing law, benefits would be assessed.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am unable to say.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is paid for out of the Treasury. They could not possibly be assessed.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The Senator is as well informed on that point as I am.

Mr. STONE. May I say to the Senator that under the act of 1913, I think is the date, $107,000 was appropriated for the purchase of this strip of land to be added to the Zoological Park. There was nothing in the original act as I recall it authorizing the assessment of benefits.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember that there ever was. Had there been I would have questioned it then.

Mr. STONE. But I think it was done under some other general law, not under the provisions of the particular act. If that be true, if I am correct about that, then the same rule would apply, I should think, to assessment benefits in acquiring the Dean property or the Patterson property or any other property for public use.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that whatever policy is followed in one ought to be followed in the other.

Mr. STONE. I think it would be.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore I asked the chairman whether that property was to be purchased in that way, but he can not give me the information.

Mr. STONE. The chairman simply states to the Senator that there is nothing in this bill authorizing the assessment of benefits, and I recall that there is nothing in the bill to which I have referred relating to the acquisition of the Zoological addition.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator remembers it just as I remember it.

Mr. STONE. Nevertheless, under some other general law, benefits were assessed in that case, and I presume they will be in this case. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I wish to offer an amendment, and I ask the Senator to allow it to be considered.

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add a like proviso at the end of the paragraph for the Patterson tract, on page 111.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that it be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, after line 8, insert:

The Chief of Engineers of the War Department is authorized and empowered to enforce the following regulations of traffic for the protection of the Washington Aqueduct and Filtration Plant and their accessories, including Conduit Road: No vehicle shall exceed a speed of 20 miles per hour, no reckless or careless driving shall be permitted, and drivers of all vehicles shall conform to the generally accepted rules for the use of public roads, as to passing to the right, signaling desire to pass, etc., and all vehicles using this road shall carry and display the lights specified by municipal regulations for vehicles within the District of Columbia, and all such lights shall be so dimmed or masked as to obviate any blinding effect upon travelers on the road; and any violation of the above regulations shall constitute an offense upon conviction for which the party or parties offending shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1 nor more than $40: Provided, That for violations of said regulation committed within the District of Columbia prosecutions shall be maintainable in the United States branch of the police court of the District of Columbia, and for such violations committed in the State of Maryland prosecutions shall be maintainable in the United States district court for the State of Maryland; and the said courts are severally vested with jurisdiction for this purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Maryland having in charge the District appropriation bill tell me for my information how much of what is known as the Dean tract is to be acquired under the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understand the whole of it.

Mr. STONE. Including the residence?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Yes; the whole property.

Mr. CLAPP. How many acres?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The quantity is given in the bill. My understanding is that it would include the whole tract and everything on it.

Mr. STONE. It was suggested to me that it did not go up to the Wyoming Apartment House or include the residence. I thought perhaps the Senator could tell me whether that was true.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. How many acres?

Mr. STONE. The number of square feet are given in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The land contains 404,425 square feet.

Mr. CLAPP. About 10 acres.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. There are about 9 acres, I have understood, in the tract.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Not quite 10 acres.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Between 9 and 10 acres.

Mr. STONE. I propose the following amendment to the bill. The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 111, after line 24, insert the following:

Readjustment of National Zoological Park boundaries: For acquiring, in accordance with the provisions of the sundry civil act approved June 23, 1913; for the condemnation of land for an addition to the National Zoological Park, all the lots, pieces, or parcels of land, other than the one therein excepted, that lie between the present western boundary of the National Zoological Park and Connecticut Avenue, from Cathedral Avenue to Klinge Road, $68,441.43, together with the sum of $107,200 appropriated for this purpose by the sundry civil act approved June 23, 1913, which is hereby reappropriated, both sums to be available until used, and said land, when acquired, together with the included highways, to be added to and become a part of the National Zoological Park; in all, $175,641.43.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will state that we accept that amendment.

Mr. STONE. I am advised that the committee will make no opposition to the amendment, but I desire, Mr. President, to place in the Record for the use of the members of the committee of conference some facts, and I will be very glad if the Senate conferees will remember that these facts are in the Record and call the attention of the House conferees to them when the matter comes up.

Mr. President, I did not offer this amendment to the bill before it was reported from the Committee on Appropriations and have it sent to the committee for consideration in the usual way for the reason that I felt that because of the enormous appropriations being made by this Congress it would be the part of wisdom, certainly the part of prudence, not to urge any appropriation that was not emergent and of immediate and pressing necessity.

That the amendment has the greatest merit there can be no doubt, but still I thought it was one of those things that might wait awhile, when we are piling up our appropriations by some several hundred millions. In this connection I may say that I have two other measures pending here involving in the aggregate appropriations of less than $150,000, one of them of special local interest in my State, that I put aside for the very reason I have already indicated—that it could wait for future action, when the pressure upon the Treasury might be less than now.

But I find that the committee has brought in here appropriations to purchase property to establish two or three parks or additions to parks; I mean the Dean tract, the Patterson tract, and the strip known as the Ashmead Place, connecting Rock Creek Park with the Potomac Park.

All of those things, I have no doubt, have great merit in them, and I have not said a word in opposition to them, and I am not going to say a word in opposition to them. When a committee composed of such representative Senators as are on the Committee on Appropriations think it proper to present these measures, I let it go, and I conform my judgment to theirs; I give up my objection.

But, Mr. President, I wish to impress upon Senators who will be upon the conference committee that the appropriation in the amendment I have offered is intended to acquire is of, I think, greater importance, in many respects, at least, than it is to acquire these additional parks at an expenditure of more than a million dollars.

The Zoological Park is practically a part of the great park of the District, Rock Creek Park. Connecticut Avenue is one of the principal streets of the city. Strange to say, there is a strip of land, embracing altogether approximately 10 acres, lying along Connecticut Avenue from Cathedral Avenue to Klinge Road, which is in private ownership and separates the Zoo Park from that great avenue. It is only a narrow pathway that enables people going to the park along that avenue to enter the park, and more people, Mr. President, go out Connecticut Avenue than along any other road—I mean people who go by street cars instead of by automobiles; hundreds and thousands go out to the park in that way.

Now, if this property is built upon, and it will be very desirable property in many ways, the backs of the houses will be turned upon the park. I never heard anyone speak of the matter who was at all familiar with it who has not agreed that it is of the highest importance that it be acquired and added to the park.

I wish to state to the Senator from Maryland, as he may not be familiar with it and I wish him to have it in mind, I did offer this amendment to the sundry civil bill. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee incorporated it in the sundry civil bill as it passed the Senate. The conferees would not agree to it, partly on the ground, as I was informed, that the price asked to be paid was more than the property was worth. I think the House conferees who made that contention and who believed it to be true, of course, were mistaken. However, the amendment I now offer is $21,000 less in amount than the amendment put in the sundry civil bill. The property is owned by a lady living in Switzerland. Her agent here communicated with her, and the result of their correspondence was an agreement upon her part to reduce her offering price by $21,000. My friend from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] suggests to me that the value thus fixed upon the property which we are asked to pay for is considerably less than the value at which it is assessed for purposes of taxation.

The Senator from Nevada tells me—the Senator from Maryland will know whether it is correct or not—that the property in this city is valued at a certain sum, and is then reduced one-third of that, or 33½ per cent, for the purpose of taxation. This property is now offered to the Government for less than it is assessed at for taxation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement in this connection?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not informed as to whether the price now fixed by the owner is below the actual assessment, but I do know it is below the appraisal made by the assessors for the assessment, the assessment itself being according to law two-third of the appraisal made by the assessors.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not care to prolong the statement, and I am going to ask to insert at this point a letter addressed to me by Dr. Charles D. Walcott, Secretary of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. I may say that the Zoological Park is under the administrative management of the Board of Regents, of which I have had the honor to have membership for some years, and I presume it is because of that that I have been requested to look after this matter. In this letter Dr. Walcott states the case very clearly, and I wish to have it in the RECORD for the use of the Senate conferees.

Also I file two tables, one showing the valuation of the property as placed by the commission appointed by the court; also the value placed for the assessment value, the area, and so on, and also a table showing the prices at which adjacent properties have been recently sold, showing that adjacent properties have been sold at a much higher price than we are asked to pay for this property.

I ask that these papers be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The papers referred to are as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, May 31, 1916.

DEAR SENATOR STONE: The Zoological Park is placed by statute under the charge of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution and the institution is responsible for its administration. The park is visited probably by more people than any other park of the Capital City, and whatever adds to its efficiency or attractiveness is a contribution to the permanent value of the National Capital.

I am sending you herewith a memorandum in relation to the addition of certain land on the western side of the Zoological Park which will connect the park with Connecticut Avenue. At present the park is entirely cut off from Connecticut Avenue by a narrow strip of land, which, if built upon, will result in a large number of back yards and other objectionable features abutting on the park. We now have a narrow entrance to the park on the Connecticut Avenue side.

When the park was laid out Connecticut Avenue was not there, otherwise it would naturally have been its western boundary. After Connecticut Avenue was cut through the District engineers planned for a roadway around the western side of the park. (See Exhibit A attached.) This road was condemned and paid for, but nothing further was done about it. Now there is in private ownership land between the park boundary and the strip of land condemned for the roadway, and also property between the suggested road and Connecticut Avenue.

The Zoological Park is one of the most attractive features of the District, and as a national park should be in every way properly developed and maintained. Of immediate importance is the addition of this land on its western side so that the park will be protected for all time on that side from objectionable buildings, back yards, etc., as before stated, and a suitable entrance provided from Connecticut Avenue. The ground is itself of such a character that it will be of great service in connection with the proper care of some of the larger animals, such as the buffalo, the elk, and the deer.

The following is a brief summary of what has been done thus far toward acquiring the land between the present western boundary of the park and Connecticut Avenue:

Congress appropriated, act approved June 23, 1913, $107,200 for the acquiring of the land between the park and Connecticut Avenue (see sketch Exhibit A attached).

Condemnation proceedings followed and benefits and damages were assessed by a jury of condemnation.

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia decided that all benefits fixed by the jury must be set aside on the ground that the jury was erroneously instructed as to the amount of benefits to be assessed.

The damages assessed were approved by the court and will stand.

Action for assessment of benefits, by which the Government will be partially reimbursed, is not excluded. The court may summon a new jury who shall report independently on the matter and the sums received would be covered into the Treasury.

The damages as assessed by the jury and the expenses of proceedings are—$106,641.43
The amount appropriated by the act of June 23, 1913, was—107,200.00

Additional sum required is—89,441.43

It will be necessary to have the original appropriation continued, as the Treasury Department has decided that the appropriation of $107,200 lapsed with the close of the fiscal year 1914. No expenditures were made from this appropriation but there is a liability of $2,203.35 for the expenses of condemnation proceedings. This is included in the $196,641.43 mentioned above.

A statement (Exhibit B) is appended, which shows the valuation placed on the land by the jury, also the valuations under the 1914 assessment and the areas of the several tracts. It will be noted that the jury's valuation is about one-fourth more than the amount of the last assessment which is somewhat more than double the amount placed on the land under the previous assessment upon which were based the original estimates for the appropriation.

The jury of condemnation valued the property to be taken at a little less than $0.43 per square foot. Careful investigation shows that actual sales of property in the neighborhood of the ground to be acquired averaged approximately $0.87 per square foot. The sales are given in Exhibit C and their locations on the sketch map (Exhibit D).

From the figures of actual sales, it appears that the jury's valuation of $0.43 per square foot is very reasonable.

The addition of this property to the Zoological Park will be a public benefit, both to the park and the people of the District of Columbia, and I earnestly hope that action will be taken at the present session of Congress on the lines of the inclosed paragraph to be added to the appropriation for the National Zoological Park for 1917. This paragraph provides for the reappropriation of the $107,200 contained in the act approved June 23, 1913, also an additional sum of $89,441.43, which will be used for acquiring the land in question. Attention is called to the fact that a considerable portion of the $89,441.43 will undoubtedly be returned to the Treasury when a new jury shall be properly constituted and assesses benefits upon adjoining properties.

In the Book of Estimates for 1917, page 849, second paragraph, there is an estimate under the heading "Readjustment of boundaries, National Zoological Park," of $30,000. The estimate of $30,000 was made prior to the final decision of the Supreme Court that none of the benefits should be allowed. The wording of the paragraph in the estimate brings the matter properly before Congress as an estimate approved by the Treasury Department. The increase from $30,000 to $89,441.43 results from the decision of the court as mentioned above.

If the land mentioned is not now secured, it will be built upon and the park irretrievably injured. I do not know of a public park in any American city that is hemmed in by back yards or does not have large areas abutting on public streets or roads.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES D. WALCOTT,
Secretary.

The Hon. W. J. STONE,
Regent of the Smithsonian Institution,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

1. Lots 40 and 41, square 2068, bought by the District of Columbia in 1915 as the site for an engine house; 7,000 square feet for $5,000, or about 71½ cents per square foot.
2. East 30 feet of lot 823, square 2082, sold in 1915 for 55 cents per square foot.
3. Lots 20 to 23, square 2082, sold in 1913 for 50 cents per square foot.
4. Parcel 55/138 sold in 1914 for 80 cents per square foot.
5. Parcel 55/140 sold for $5,000 per acre in 1913, and bona fide offer of $6,000 per acre refused in 1915.
6. Parcel 54/16 sold in 1910 for $46,000.
7. Kennedy Bros. made an offer of from $80,000 to $85,000 in April, 1912, for this tract, graded. It contains 103,692 square feet. The grading would cost perhaps $10,000, and, with this deducted, the rate for the land would be about 70 cents per square foot. The jury's valuation was 75 cents. The offer was refused. The grading along the front of the property was done after this offer was made, but before condemnation proceedings were begun.
8. Lots 34 to 37, square 2109, sold at 70 cents per square foot about 1909.
9. Lots 19 to 32, square 2109, sold in 1910 for 55 cents per square foot.

15. Parcel 54/7 sold in 1910 for $1 per square foot.
16. Parcel 54/14 sold in 1909 for 85 cents per square foot.
17. One lot, square 2204, 6,000 square feet, sold for $7,000, or about $1.17 per square foot.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator what is the amount of the appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. STONE. The total amount?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is it necessary to buy that land now in order that the Government may get it?

Mr. STONE. Of course it may be sold to anyone else. It is private property and any number of people can purchase the lots and build houses on them and turn the backs of the houses upon the park. If we wanted to get it in the future we would have to condemn it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course I shall never do anything that will prevent or interfere in any way with the proper development of Washington. I have pride in the growth of the city as the Capital of the Nation. I realize the necessity for parks and the great advantage they are to the poorer classes of people who find in them their only opportunity for recreation. I would not limit the authorities of the city of Washington in providing these essential comforts. But there are others who do not live in the cities and whose interests are not the subject of as deep solicitude on the part of the lawmakers at Washington as they deserve to be. And the class to whom I refer are the people who till the soil and whose labor feed and clothe the world.

We had a bill before the Senate yesterday carrying an appropriation of $196,000 for the purpose of paying debts that the United States Government acknowledges that it owes to more than 1,000 people living in the States of Kentucky, North and South Carolina, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, and Alabama—the old mail-contract debts. The point was made against that bill that the appropriations have become so enormous that the Government could not afford to settle its honest debts at this time. A shameful confession, and I think wholly unjustified by the facts.

But if it is so, I think we ought to call a halt on some of the appropriations, such as is proposed by the Senator from Missouri. The park can wait. The claims to which I referred a moment ago are held by people who are really in need and who have waited for a half century for a settlement which has not been made, and which the Congress now refuses to make. The Government owes them and the Government ought to pay them. If a private individual were as dishonest or unjust in his business transactions as the Government of the United States is in some instances, he would be outlawed and ostracized from decent society. I submit, Mr. President, that before this Government undertakes to indulge in the generosity of providing the luxury of parks for the poor people of the city it should practice a little justice in paying its honest debts to the people out of the city.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. On page 51, line 18, I offer an amendment on behalf of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, line 18, strike out "3" and insert "4," so as to read "$4,000" instead of "$3,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment of the committee was agreed to is reconsidered. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee is agreed to, and, without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator in charge of the bill we have lately passed a law which exempted from taxation some property the Daughters of the American Revolution had bought here subsequent to the original purchase. In the interim, rather than to explain why they did not pay their taxes, it was suggested that they pay their taxes, and if the bill became a law it would be a very easy matter to have a bill passed to reimburse them for the taxes. The taxes which they paid amounted to $271. I have the tax certificate here, if there is any question raised as to that. It is a small matter. I realize that probably it would be subject to a point of order, but it is one of those things that nobody in particular has to look after. To save them the bother of trying to get the bill passed through both Houses, if it is agreeable to the Senator in charge of the bill, I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 122, after line 16, insert:

That the sum of $271.76 is hereby appropriated to repay the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution the taxes paid by said society upon lots 23, 24, 25, 27, and 28, square 173, in the District of Columbia, as follows: $143.78 as per receipt for taxes paid March 14, 1916; $127.98 as per receipt for taxes paid March 31, 1916; in all, $271.76; said sum to be paid upon the presentation of said receipts by the treasurer general of said society.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I make no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I offer an amendment to which I think there will be no objection.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 19, after the words "District of Columbia," to strike out "prior to July 1, 1886," and insert "during the years 1914, 1915, or 1916," and in line 22, after the words "District of Columbia," to strike out "prior to July 1, 1904," and insert "during the years 1914, 1915, or 1916."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Texas. I have an amendment which will take but a moment, I think.

The United States Statutes, volume 30, page 666, reads as follows:

Hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not accept volunteer service for the government of the District of Columbia or employ personal services in excess of that authorized by law except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

It has been found in some instances that that works a hardship, and the act approved March 4, 1915, changed this provision:

Sec. 2. That the board of education is authorized to accept, upon written recommendation of the superintendent of schools, free and voluntary services of the teachers of the public schools, other educators, lecturers, and social workers and public officers of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, the good people who are in charge of the playgrounds of the District of Columbia have had offers of voluntary service from people who are greatly interested in that enterprise; and they would very much like to have this provision—which is exactly similar to that which I have read—inserted after the numerals on line 14, page 45. I will send the amendment to the desk, and ask to have the Secretary read it. I think there will be no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 45, line 14, after the numerals "$18,000," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the board of education is hereby authorized to accept, upon written recommendation of the superintendent of schools, free and voluntary service in connection with the work of the department of playgrounds, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this provision be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new paragraph, as follows:

That any person who, within the District of Columbia, in any manner, for exhibition or display, shall after this act takes effect place or cause to be placed any word, figure, mark, picture, design, drawing, or any advertisement of any nature upon any flag, standard, colors, or ensign of the United States of America, or shall expose or cause to be exposed to public view within the District of Columbia any flag, standard, colors, or ensign upon which, after this act takes effect, shall have been printed, painted, or otherwise placed, or to which shall be attached, appended, affixed, or annexed any word, figure, mark, picture, design, or drawing, or any advertisement of any nature; or who, after this act takes effect, shall expose to public view, manufacture, sell, expose for sale, give away, or have in possession for sale or to give away, or for use for any purpose, any article or substance being an article of merchandise, or a receptacle of merchandise or article or thing for carrying or transporting merchandise, upon which after this act takes effect shall have been printed, painted, attached, or otherwise placed a representation of any such flag, standard, colors, or ensign, to advertise, call attention to, decorate, mark, or distinguish the article or substance on which so placed; or who, within the District of Columbia, shall publicly mutilate, deface, defile, or defy, trample upon, or cast contempt, either by words or act, upon any such flag, standard, colors, or ensign, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or both, in the discretion of the court, and shall also forfeit a penalty of $50 for each such offense, to be recovered with costs in a civil action or suit in any court having jurisdiction; and such action or suit may be brought in the name of the United States of America or by and in the name of any citizen, and such penalty when collected by any citizen, less the reasonable cost and expense of action or suit and recovery, to be certified by the United States attorney of the District of Columbia, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and two or more penalties may be sued for and recovered in the same action or suit. The words "flag, standard, colors, or ensign," as used in this section, shall include any flag, standard, colors, ensign, or any picture or representation of either thereof, or of any part or parts of either thereof, made of any substance or represented on any substance and of any size evidently purporting to be either of said flag, standard, colors, or ensign of the United States of America or a picture or a representation of either thereof, upon which shall be shown the colors, the stars, and the stripes in any number of either thereof, or of any part or parts of either thereof, or by which the person seeing the same without deliberation may believe the same to represent the flag, colors, standard, or ensign of the United States of America.

The possession after this act takes effect, within the District of Columbia, by any person other than a public officer, as such, of any such flag, standard, colors, or ensign on which shall be anything made unlawful at any time by this section, or of any article or substance or thing on which shall be anything made unlawful at any time by this section, shall be presumptive evidence that the same is in violation of this section and was made, done, or created after this act took effect, and that such flag, standard, colors, ensign, or article, substance, or thing did not exist when this act took effect.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I raise the point of order that that is general legislation, and should not go on this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to have been an impression that when the Chair expressed an opinion the other day that the officials who serve the government here are simply agents of the Government, and that the District of Columbia is not a municipal corporation, that authorized any amendment to be made to this appropriation bill.

The Chair did not say so, and does not believe so. Regardless of what this government may be, there are laws that do govern the citizens resident in the District of Columbia. This is a general appropriation bill. To it the rule of the Senate does not permit general legislation to be introduced as an amendment, unless the House, in the judgment of the Chair, has first taken the initiative in the legislation, in which event the Senate, in the opinion of the Chair, may pursue that subject to its full length.

This is an entirely new question. The Chair holds it is general legislation, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, if the Senate agrees to the principle which could be inferred from the language employed by the Vice President in holding the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] in order, it will overrule the decision of the Chair as to this amendment.

The Vice President, in concluding the opinion which he rendered on the admissibility of the amendment of the Senator from California—an amendment which radically changed the system of taxation in the District of Columbia—expressed the opinion that the District of Columbia was a mere agency of the Government, and that legislation affecting that agency was therefore special legislation and not general legislation in the sense of the rule which prohibits the attachment of general legislation to an appropriation bill.

I have offered this amendment in order to ascertain whether the Senate is in sympathy with a principle of that kind. I believe it to be a wise principle. I believe that general legislation ought to be attached to the District bill in order that matters pertaining to the District will have serious consideration and careful attention at the hands of the Senate. As it is now, bills that are introduced independently of the appropriation bills get as a rule very little attention.

I trust, therefore, that the Senate will overrule the Vice President, and establish here the principle that general legislation is admissible on the District bill, and hold itself in sympathy with what the concluding language of the ruling the other day purported to hold. Therefore, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Vice President. The District of Columbia is not an independent municipality, but a mere arm or bureau of the Government, subject under the Constitution, the very law of its being, to the Government's absolute control. The District appropriation bill is itself, therefore, special legislation, and so are all measures relating to the District.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I did not myself construe the ruling of the Chair on my amendment as some other Senators seem to have done. I think the ruling of the Chair in that case was perfectly correct. The subject there was taxation and the appropriation of the money of the Government, or of the District, as the case might be. My amendment did not change in any material respect the law as it exists at the present time, as I contended, and I think myself that the ruling of the Chair was just on an entirely different ground than that stated by the Senator from Texas. I have felt so all along.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I think the proposition presented by the Senator from Texas is entirely different from the case presented by the amendment of the Senator from California for this reason: There the subject matter touched by the Senator's amendment had already been legislated upon by the House of Representatives; and the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, as well as the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, related to the same subject matter, which was taxation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Vice President stated that the matter had been dealt with in the House. He added that the District of Columbia was a special agency of the Government, and that legislation pertaining to that special agency was special, and not general. I will ask the Senator if in his opinion, in view of that language, it might not be reasonably inferred that the Vice President held that legislation pertaining to the District was special and not general legislation?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad the Senator puts it that way. The Vice President's ruling about the Works amendment, in my judgment, was right; but it was right only because the House of Representatives having legislated on that subject, and the Senate committee having dealt with the same subject, the amendment of the Senator from California, dealing with the same subject, was in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But the Vice President did not confine himself to that reason.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand that, and I am coming to that part of the Senator's suggestion right now. I did not think at the time, nor do I think now, that all of the reasoning given by the Vice President was sound. Whether or not technically the District of Columbia constituted a municipality within the meaning of the law-book writers, I did not believe that for that reason we could go out and legislate on a general appropriation bill for the District of Columbia with respect to matters in the District of Columbia. So that with that part of the Vice President's reasoning I was never in accord. But when I thought about the question of prosecuting an appeal from the ruling it seemed to me like the prosecution of such an appeal was unnecessary, because while that much of the reasoning of the Vice President was, according to my opinion, unsound, undoubtedly the Vice President's ruling was right on the second ground that he stated, namely, that the House having legislated on this question, and the amendment of the Senator from California relating to that precise matter, it was in order.

I say, therefore, that I regarded it as unnecessary for the Senate to reverse the ruling of the Vice President. I did not see how it could do it, and I think it is no authority for the proposition now made by the Senator from Texas. It seems to me like the ruling of the Vice President is perfectly sound and follows the unbroken precedents of this body through many years.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seemed to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from California went further than the proposition covered by the provision put in by the House. I felt that so far as the matter of taxation was concerned, and the matter of distributing the money, the House having opened the door, that could properly be covered by the part of the amendment of the Senator from California relating to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment? I just want to suggest to the Senator that while that is true, the House having opened the door, the Senator from California and the Senate committee could only pursue that precise field, and were only proposing to do so. Although they may have gone a little further, and although the proposition may have been a little different, that does not affect the principle that we are merely pursuing the field that the House had entered.

Mr. JONES. That was the point. I think we not only went into the field opened by the House, but we went into another field.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator, of course, understands how difficult it is to draw the line there.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is very difficult with respect to the amendment of the Senator from California. He may differ from me; but the Senator from California proposed to do away with the District of Columbia, and make it the City of Washington.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but the Senator's amendment, after all, related to the subject of taxation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES. Oh, well, it related in part to the subject of taxation.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the Senator is quite familiar with the precedent established the other day, that because there had been some legislation in the House about the personnel of the Navy, therefore it was ruled that the Senate could proceed to legislate with respect to the personnel of the Dental Corps, although the House had made no change in existing law on that particular subject.

Mr. JONES. The Senator does not get the point I am trying to make. It is that a part of the amendment of the Senator from California was out of order because it referred to a subject that had not been dealt with by the House, and that, to my mind, was not connected with it. If that were true, then the whole amendment would be out of order and subject to a point of order.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I took this view of it: I did not discuss the ruling at the time, because it was in my favor; but I took the view of it that the other provisions, abolishing the District and changing the name, were only incidental to the ultimate object of the amendment, which was the control of taxation and the proper making of appropriations. Now, that ultimate object had been dealt with by the House and had also been dealt with by the Senate committee; and for that reason I was pretty sure at the time that I would have to meet that question when the amendment was offered, and I felt pretty sure in my own mind that the amendment could be sustained on that ground.

Mr. JONES. But, Mr. President, my contention is that the provision changing the name of the District was entirely independent of the proposition relating to taxation. The proposition relating to taxation could be carried out without the other without any difficulty or any trouble at all. It was simply an additional field that the amendment of the Senator from California went into, which had not been gone into by the House. Under all the rules of parliamentary law, if an amendment is offered, part of it all right, part of it germane, part of it in order, but some of it out of order, the whole amendment goes out, and the part that is in order can be offered as a separate amendment.

But, Mr. President, I would justify the ruling which the Vice President made the other day more upon the ground that this is not a general appropriation bill. I do not believe it comes within the designation of a general appropriation bill under our rules. It simply appropriates for a particular agency of the Government, as the Vice President said.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield just a moment, that is true about all general appropriation bills, is it not?

They all appropriate for some particular agency of the Government, do they not?

Mr. JONES. They are general, applying to all sections of the country, relating to some general subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, now, let us see. The Senator's definition, then, applies to every one of the great appropriation bills. Now, let us go one step further. The House of Representatives classifies the District of Columbia appropriation bill expressly as one of the general appropriation bills in its rules; does it not?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator will find that is a fact, under the House rules and precedents.

Mr. JONES. That would not cut any figure in regard to the Senate rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not necessarily. It might be persuasive, however, if the systems are somewhat alike.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. It would not be binding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SHEPPARD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I understood that if present he would vote on this matter as I would, so I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before, and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I announce the same pair and transfer as heretofore and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement that I made heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. Making the same transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, after line 22, it is proposed to insert:

Roentgenologist, $600.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I send to the desk a letter on this subject, addressed to the chairman of the committee, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1916.

The Hon. JOHN WALTER SMITH,
The Capitol, City.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call attention to Union Calendar No. 223, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, H. R. 15774, Report No. 271, a bill making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Page 76, line 25, for the purchase of X-ray machine and accessories, $2,000, for tuberculosis hospital.

I believe the original estimate was $2,750, based on estimates made by me, the roentgenologist, to the superintendent of the hospital. This in my opinion was barely enough to purchase the absolute necessities of such a laboratory. Note as follows a few of the actual necessities itemized:

Interrupterless transformer with switches, etc.	$1,200
Combined fluoroscopic, radiographic, stereoscopic table and stand	1,200
Coolidge tubes with accessories	375

Total	2,775

This makes no provision even for treatment stand at $250, stereoscopic box at $125, or any dark-room fixtures, lead-lined partitions, etc., all of which is additional expense.

To-day a Roentgen ray laboratory is an absolute necessity as an aid in the establishment or confirmation of a diagnosis of a tuberculous process. The result of such an examination frequently determines the subsequent treatment, and later on it again aids in determining the extent of the improvement or otherwise and the subsequent procedure. The present superintendent has done good work in pneumothorax operations with such aid as the roentgenologist was able to give, but lack of efficient Roentgen ray equipment has compelled him to restrict his efforts in this direction.

The Roentgen ray is used also in the treatment of various forms of tuberculosis with good results, both in glandular tuberculosis and in certain stages of pulmonary tuberculosis. This is called deep Roentgen ray therapy. In certain stages of tuberculous glands the X ray is more efficient than surgery, and in my own practice I have achieved the most brilliant results with the use of X rays after repeated surgical interventions failed to prevent recurrences. Dr. Gibson, of Colorado, has done more work in this line than anyone else in this country, and his results were exceedingly gratifying. One should remember, therefore, that an X-ray equipment is intended not only for diagnostic but also for treatment work. A good efficient apparatus must do fluoroscopic, radiographic, and treatment work well and economically. Cheap apparatus is entirely too expensive in the end. Private roentgenologists with limited means install only the very best materials, but hospitals and similar institutions not guided in their purchases by medical men trained in roentgenology usually buy the least expensive outfits and are notorious for never having a thoroughly efficient equipment. This largely explains so many therapeutic failures.

I sincerely trust that the committee will provide, if possible, sufficient funds for the purchase of an adequate equipment that will stand the test for years to come; $2,000 will not do so.

On June 22, 1914, I was appointed roentgenologist at the Tuberculosis Hospital, to serve without compensation, from the District of Columbia. For two years I have tried to X-ray the patients designated by the superintendent, using the outfit we have. In order to do this work I have been compelled to carry personal equipment from my office to the hospital and back again. I did this as a matter of personal friendship to the superintendent and the scientific interest involved. The superintendent is fully aware to the needs of the Roentgen laboratory, but is helpless under present conditions. The outfit at the hospital is entirely inadequate and not at all fit for treatment work.

I note that the bill makes no provision for compensation of the roentgenologist. The latter does not expect ever to receive anything like what his services are worth, but with his usual modesty suggests that at least $50 per month be set aside for his gasoline bills and wear and tear on his general nervous system, let alone the actual danger to which a roentgenologist is constantly exposed as the result of the injurious effects of X-rays on the operator. Should the committee hold that the granting of such an honorarium could be achieved only by the resignation of the present roentgenologist, such resignation will be placed in the hands of the commissioners by special messenger as soon as possible.

A vast amount of X-ray work needs to be done at the hospital. I feel confident that much good will accrue to patients that would otherwise succumb to the ravages of the disease. I am fully aware that the committee has very little time for the investigation of such a small item as this, but I should be glad at any time to meet the committee if this is desired.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES A. PFENDER.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee for just a moment. On page 30, under the heading "Construction of suburban roads," there is a provision put in by the House, as follows—

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. What line, please?

Mr. JONES. Lines 1 and 2.

Northeast. Rhode Island Avenue, South Dakota Avenue to District line, grade and improve, $17,000.

A party who claims to know the situation there told me that for about 400 feet of this road that it is intended to improve a certain party owns along the right of way that is to be improved 9 feet on each side of the proposed street; that he has sold the lots on each side of the street and holds those strips on each side, and that the rest of the right of way has been donated to the Government. I do not know whether or not that is true, but if it is true then we ought not to appropriate this money to be expended there until the right of way is acquired, either by donation or in some other way. I make the suggestion in order that the matter may be investigated.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am unable to give the Senator from Washington the information that he desires, but I will state that the subject will be investigated in conference.

Mr. JONES. That is what I was going to suggest. I think it would be well to strike this item out and then the committee can investigate the matter in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. If it is stricken out, it can not be considered in conference.

Mr. JONES. It can not be considered if it is not stricken out, because it is a provision of the House text.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That is true. I had overlooked that fact.

Mr. JONES. So, Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 1 and 2 on page 30, for the reason that I have stated. I do not know whether or not the facts are as I have stated them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Washington if he is acquainted with the width of that avenue, exclusive of those two strips?

Mr. JONES. No; I am not. The information came to me recently; but those two strips are a part of the road which is to be improved. This being a suburban road, I do not imagine it is very wide. I thought that the facts might be looked into by the committee of conference, though I repeat I do not know whether or not the information I have is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection to striking out the provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 30 it is proposed to strike out lines 1 and 2, as follows:

Northeast. Rhode Island Avenue, South Dakota Avenue to District line, grade and improve, $17,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, at the instance of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota on behalf of the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 5, on page 112, it is proposed to insert:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to acquire the land requisite for the preservation of the Klinge Ford Valley, in the District of Columbia, and the necessary approaches, including such land as may be needed for the extension of Jewett Street west of Connecticut Avenue in accordance with the plan attached to report on Klinge Ford Valley dated July 19, 1916.

That for the purpose of acquiring said lands the sum of $164,849 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That one-half of said sum, or so much thereof as may be expended, shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of the revenues of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That if said commissioners shall be unable to purchase said land at a price not exceeding the sum of $164,349, or at such price less than said sum of $164,349 as they may deem reasonable, then they shall proceed to acquire said land in the manner prescribed for providing a site for an addition to the Government Printing Office in so much of the act approved July 1, 1898, as set forth on pages 648 and 649 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large of the United States, and for the purposes of said acquisition the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have and exercise all powers conferred upon the Public Printer in said act: And provided further, That the public park and parkways authorized and established by this act shall become a part of the park system of the District of Columbia in accordance with the act of July 1, 1898.

That for the purpose of laying out, grading, and improving the extension of Jewett Street west of Connecticut Avenue in accordance with the plans hereinbefore referred to the sum of $16,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States, one-half to be reimbursed to it out of the revenues of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the appropriation made by this section shall be available only in the event that the owner or owners of the land embraced within the lines of the said proposed extension of Jewett Street shall dedicate said land for the purpose of the extension of said street without cost to the United States or the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, the committee makes no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask to recur to page 25, line 19; and I move that the vote whereby the amendment there was agreed to be reconsidered, for the purpose of making a clerical correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none. The question is on reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, in line 19, before the word "third," I move to strike out the article "the" and insert the article "a."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 19, before the word "third" it is proposed to strike out the article "the" and to insert the article "a," so as to read:

For the erection of a third steel shelter at the Farmers' Produce Market, $15,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did I understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] was adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have some explanation of that amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah object to the amendment because of the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I want to know something about the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. I want a chance to vote on that amendment, and to vote against it.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the Chair make any announcement concerning the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. Then I want to give notice now that I shall reserve the amendment and ask for a separate vote upon it when the bill gets into the Senate. That will accomplish my object.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote on the amendment on page 46, line 9, and on the amendment on page 119, from line 16 to line 22, both inclusive.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I reserve the right to ask for a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment on page 28, from line 18 to line 20, both inclusive, providing for the repaving of Fourteenth Street between Pennsylvania Avenue and F Street.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer and which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, at the end of line 13, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That the Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby directed to appoint a board of engineer officers, of which the local district engineer officer in charge of river work at Washington and the officer in charge of public buildings and ground shall be members, and of which the latter shall be executive and disbursing officer, to collaborate with the Commission of Fine Arts in preparing and reporting a plan for the artistic and utilitarian development of the commercial water front of Washington, on which the said market buildings are to be constructed; that the board be authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as they deem necessary, and also to receive the advice and cooperation, without compensation, of such engineers and architects as may be selected by the American societies of engineers and architects; that $5,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the board.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I raise the point of order on this amendment that it is general legislation, and that the appropriation therein proposed has not been estimated for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say with reference to the point of order that the District appropriation bill provides $60,000 for finishing the construction of market buildings on the site of the present municipal fish wharf and market on the commercial water front of Washington, lying between the Bureau of Printing and Engraving and the War College.

It is absolutely necessary, in order to properly locate the buildings to be constructed on that water front, that there should be a plan for the water front itself, which will include the piers and the wharves and the various machinery and devices in aid of transportation—transshipment from ship to car and from car to ship—and which shall embrace the proper conveniences for warehouses, storehouses, refrigerating houses, and so forth, that may be located upon that water front. It is just as essential to have a plan for the water front itself as it is to have a plan for the foundation of the building that is to be constructed; and there can be no proper adjustment of the building on that water front until the water front is planned.

I wish to say in this connection that this piece of water front is about the only piece that has not been placed under the jurisdiction of the Engineering Department. The Corps of Engineers of the Army have had jurisdiction over the entire Anacostia River upon both sides. That corps is now engaged in the most elaborate development of those water fronts, embracing park development and other improvements. They have also jurisdiction over the space from Georgetown down to the end of the island park and over that side of the island park which fronts the commercial water front to which I allude. It has only recently, however, been decided that that water front belongs to the Government instead of to private owners—a matter which was in doubt for many years. So that water front has not been planned as intelligently and scientifically as has the rest of the water front of Washington; in fact, it has not been planned at all, but it lies there a water front of neglected and rotting wharves and piers, and is a disgrace to the city.

Now, the District government and the United States are about to erect upon that water front two very important buildings—one the power plant and the other the fish market. Both of them are utilitarian buildings; and it is of the highest importance that the Engineer Corps of the Army should be authorized, with the aid of the Commission of Fine Arts, to plan a water front before these buildings are constructed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Nevada will pardon the Chair, the merits of the amendment are not before the Senate at this time. A point of order has been made against the amendment, and the Chair would be glad to hear the Senator from Nevada address himself to the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to state to the Senator from Nevada and to the Chair that, in my judgment, as I heard the amendment read, it is not general legislation at all, but is simply a special provision directing certain persons to do one certain thing—to investigate and make a report. It is not general legislation in any sense of the term. Therefore, I think it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true, Mr. President, and I only went into the general merits of the proposition to show its importance and its connection with this particular building. If this building is going to be erected there must be proper foundations for it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, while I do not care to debate the point of order, the amendment certainly changes existing law and makes an appropriation that has not been estimated for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I claim that it does not change existing law in that it simply extends the operation of legislation contained in this bill with reference to a particular building so as to include the surroundings of that building, in order that it may be properly placed with reference to a scientific development of the water front.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be very glad to hear from the Senator from Nevada on the other point made by the Senator from Maryland, namely, that no estimate for this appropriation has been made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand that any estimate is required for increasing an appropriation that is provided for in the bill, and the amendment is practically an increase of the appropriation of $60,000 for a particular building.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Which has not been estimated for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The building has been estimated for, and the amendment provides for necessary and essential work in connection with that building.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not see how the Senator can sustain that contention. We have appropriated for the rebuilding of the wharves at the fish market, and we have now appropriated for the building of a fish market. Those are two accomplished facts. While I would be very glad to have made the improvement contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, and I think it is desirable that it should be made at some time, yet if there is any way to attach the Senator's amendment to the provisions of this bill in a legislative way, I fail to discover it. I think the point of order made by the chairman of the committee that the amendment proposes an appropriation not estimated for or reported from a standing committee is absolutely controlling.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator the amount of the appropriation carried by his amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. KENYON. Why does not the Senator raise it to a hundred thousand dollars, and then it would go through probably without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair finds no way of escaping the conclusion suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, and accordingly sustains the point of order raised by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is, that it has not been estimated for. Then, Mr. President, I will offer the amendment without an appropriation and as a limitation upon the $60,000 appropriated by this bill for the market building. I will shape the amendment in that way in order to meet the requirement.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I will raise the point of order on the amendment that it is general legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not offered the modified amendment as yet.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I beg the Senator's pardon. I understood the Senator to offer it eliminating the appropriation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am preparing it now. I offer now the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, at the end of line 13, it is proposed to insert the amendment modified to read as follows:

And provided further, That the Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby directed to appoint a board of engineer officers, of which the local district engineer officer in charge of river work at Washington and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall be members, and of which the latter shall be executive and disbursing officer, to collaborate with the Commission of Fine Arts in preparing and reporting a plan for the artistic and utilitarian development of the commercial water front of Washington, on which the said market buildings are to be constructed; that the board be authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as they deem necessary; that so much of the $60,000 above provided for the construction of such market building as is necessary, not exceeding $5,000, is appropriated to defray the expenses of the board.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I raise the point of order that the amendment proposes general legislation. It is more glaringly obnoxious to the rule now than before, if possible, for it proposes to devote to a different use money that has already been appropriated for a particular purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the preparation of a plan for the improvement of ground upon which a building is to be erected is so intimately associated with the erection of the building itself that the amendment is a proper one. The Chair accordingly overrules the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Chair decides that let me call his attention to the fact that this provision, commencing on line 1, page 25, is:

For completing the construction of market buildings on the site of the present municipal fish wharf.

And so forth. In other words, Mr. President, we have made appropriations for those buildings, and now to complete them we make an appropriation of $60,000. Can it be that a portion of that appropriation can be diverted to some other purpose when we are simply carrying out the law that is now on the statute books requiring the appropriation of a certain amount of money, to wit, $60,000, to complete the work? It strikes me as being extraordinary that we can do that under our rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Chair were able to take the view of the question as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, he would be obliged to concur with him. The Chair does not take the view, however, that the amendment seeks to divert a portion of the appropriation to an entirely separate and distinct purpose. The Chair has in mind the fact that the appropriation in the bill is for the completion of the building, but the Chair can very readily understand that an appropriation can be made for the construction of a building and a further appropriation made for the completion of the building, including the beautification and general improvement of the grounds on which the building is situated; indeed the Chair has in mind the construction of a house by himself. After the house was constructed the improvement and beautification of the grounds about it were items of no little expense.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the answer to the position the Chair takes is that we have already made an appropriation for the construction of the wharves; plans were made, and, I think, the work has commenced; so that the beautification of the water front has nothing to do with the particular part of the water front on which the market building is to be erected. An appropriation has been made for the wharves, and we have made an appropriation for the buildings. The item of $60,000 is what remains of that appropriation, and it is provided that it shall complete the construction of the buildings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that this is a plan for the beautification of a large tract of land, including the tract upon which these buildings are in process of erection.

Mr. GALLINGER. But we have made appropriations to do the work where the buildings are located. The plan proposed by the amendment will have nothing to do with that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I heard the amendment read it did not state to whom the commission shall report—whether to Congress or to the President. I desire to suggest an amendment after the word "report," so that it will read "report to Congress."

Mr. NEWLANDS. The resolution reads:

To collaborate with the Commission of Fine Arts in preparing and reporting a plan for the artistic and utilitarian development of the commercial water front of Washington.

Mr. JONES. To whom will they report?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should presume to Congress, and I will put in those words.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the Senator modify the amendment in that way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask to perfect the amendment by inserting the words "to Congress" in line 8, after the word "reporting."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have not been able to get a definite understanding of the amendment as the Senator has modified it. I was very much impressed with the amendment before modified, but I think the amendment has not been fully stated since. I should like to have it read again or to have the Senator from Nevada explain just what is sought to be accomplished by the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will explain it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, if the Senator will excuse me a moment, this bill, I think, can be passed in a very few minutes. It is now nearly 6.30 o'clock, at which time, under the order heretofore made, the Senate must adjourn or take a recess. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that we extend the time this evening in order that this bill may be passed.

Mr. GRONNA. I object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My amendment comes in immediately after the appropriation of $60,000 for the completion of the market building on the municipal fish wharf.

Mr. NORRIS. On what page?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The amendment comes on page 25, after line 13, and reads:

And provided further, That the Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby directed to appoint a board of engineer officers, of which the local district engineer officer in charge of river work at Washington and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall be members—

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a necessary motion?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. It is now 6.30 o'clock, and under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made we must either take a recess or adjourn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 2, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 2, 1916.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 1, 1916).

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Jones	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Penrose	Sterling
Clapp	Kern	Pittman	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Ransdell	Swanson

Johnson, Me.	Norris	Smith, Md.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is absent to-day on important business. He is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

I wish also to announce the absence on account of illness of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland rose.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I desire to present a little matter that has come under my observation, and is, I think, particularly fitting at this time, in view of the fact that the presidential nominee of the Republican Party has just been notified of his nomination. I clipped this from yesterday's Washington Star. First I will read the telegram from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The Senator from Utah forwards this telegram from Salt Lake City—

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I asked unanimous consent. This will take but a second. I only want to read this into the RECORD. I feel that it is fitting and proper at this time. I will take no time. The telegram from Senator SUTHERLAND to Mr. Hughes says:

You will no doubt recall our conversation a few days ago, when I urged you to make public your views with regard to the equal-suffrage Federal amendment. I feel quite sure there is nothing in the Republican platform which in any manner would conflict with such a declaration. That platform commits the party to the principle of woman suffrage and recognizes the right of each State to determine the question for itself.

It is silent upon the subject of constitutional amendment, and therefore leaves everybody of the party free to determine for himself this question. The submission of the amendment is desired by many millions of voters, and I think the day is coming when Congress should recognize this widespread desire by adopting the "resolution of submission," and thus enabling the States to pass upon the question, which, without the preliminary action of Congress, they will be prevented from doing.

That constitutes the telegram of Senator SUTHERLAND to Mr. Hughes. Mr. Hughes responds and states his position:

Your telegram has been received. In my answer to the notification I did not refer to the proposed Federal amendment relating to woman suffrage, as this was not mentioned in the platform. I have no objection, however, to stating my personal views. As I said in my speech, I think it to be most desirable that the question of woman suffrage should be settled promptly. The question is of such a nature that it should be settled for the entire country.

My view is that the proposed amendment should be submitted and ratified and the subject removed from political discussion.

This will be delightful information to the thousands who voted in the nonsuffrage States. Mr. Hughes proposes to adopt a constitutional amendment whereby this may be settled. The people in the State of New Jersey voted by a majority of about 60,000 in opposition to it. The State of Pennsylvania voted very largely as well in opposition to this project, and the State of New York, as well as very many other States. I suppose, inasmuch as the Republican presidential candidate takes this view of this proposition, we may next reasonably anticipate, in harmony with the same thought, a prohibition amendment in like terms and in like phrase. I ask that this may be published in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, since the Senator from New Jersey has defeated Mr. Hughes, I think we ought to go on with the regular business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not know whether I have defeated him or not, but the voice of the people will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is getting to be a perfect farce in dragging politics into the Senate during the morning hour with the view of getting one's ideas in the RECORD. Of course, I can not agree with the Senator from New Jersey on the suffrage question. If I were going to say anything upon the question, I would commend the wisdom and the forethought of Mr. Hughes for the position he has taken. I desist from offering any newspaper editorials for the RECORD. I think the practice should stop, and it ought to have ceased long ago. Do I understand the Senator to ask that additional matter be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I do not care. My remarks will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right. As far as anything that was not read is concerned, I object, as I gave notice I would object to all newspaper articles going into the RECORD in the future.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that possibly in the same afternoon's paper, if not in another, it was stated that the President of the United States would follow in the same lines very soon.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, at the end of line 18, insert:

And provided further, That the Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby directed to appoint a board of engineer officers, of which the local district engineer officer in charge of river work at Washington and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall be members, and of which the latter shall be executive and disbursing officer, to collaborate with the Commission of Fine Arts in preparing and reporting to Congress a plan for the artistic and utilitarian development of the commercial water front of Washington, on which the said market buildings are to be constructed; that the board be authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as they deem necessary; that so much of the $60,000 above provided for the construction of such market buildings as is necessary, not exceeding $5,000, is appropriated to defray the expenses of the board.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words regarding this amendment as changed. It provides that out of this appropriation of $60,000, the last installment, I believe, for the construction of the fish market, a sum not exceeding $5,000 shall be devoted to the formation of plans for the water front upon which the fish market is located. I wish simply to repeat what I have said heretofore, because I imagine there are some in the Senate who were not here when I explained this amendment.

There stands upon the wall a plan of parkway development, consisting of what is known as the Island Park, extending from the Southern Railway line down to a point opposite the War College. On the other side of this park, between the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the War College, a little over a mile, there is a water-front stretch which has been absolutely neglected and with reference to which no definite plans have been made, the title of the water front having been in doubt and having been only recently declared in favor of the United States Government.

The Engineer Corps of the Army, with the aid of the Commission of Arts, acting under authority hitherto granted by Congress, has made practically the plans for the entire water front of Washington except for this short space. The result is that we have a very attractive plan for the development of the water front on both sides of the Anacostia River and for the development on both sides of the Potomac River of the entire island park, and the water front itself, so far as the War College is concerned, is the only part which has been neglected thus far.

The Government is authorizing very expensive buildings to be put up on this water front. It has already authorized the power plant, which will cost several hundred thousand dollars, and the fish market, which will cost probably a couple hundred thousand dollars, and doubtless other buildings for a useful purpose will be put upon that water front. The question is as to whether it shall be made of an attractive design, and whether the entire water front shall be planned in harmony with the general purpose, or whether there shall be an accidental and sporadic development upon that water front which will be hereafter regretted.

This particular water front is practically the framing of the entire Mall and island park plan of parks, and it is of the highest importance that it should not only be constructed in such a way as to advance every utilitarian purpose, but that it shall be pleasing to the eye.

I have caused photographs of the various water fronts of Europe to be placed upon the wall, all of which show the highest development that water-front planning has reached in other countries. America, energetic and enterprising in so many directions, has thus far neglected this form of development, and we have nowhere in the United States, with perhaps one or two exceptions, water-front development upon the lines of art as well as utility. The fact is that water fronts have hardly been designed with reference to utility, but their development has been permitted in an accidental way.

I am aware that many looking at that water front to-day with its rotten and neglected wharves and unattractive appearance might feel that the place is hopeless, but a similar comment I imagine could have been made years ago regarding the banks of the Seine in Paris and regarding the banks of the Thames in London, where the most beautiful and artistic and utilitarian developments have been made, and the banks of the Rhine, and the Danube, and the Volga. I have no doubt that in the process of evolution in the first instance those water fronts were permitted to lie in neglect in a condition unplanned either by the engineer or by the artist. But it seems to me it is time for America to take a position with reference to this matter, and as Washington is to be the model city of the United States to which those planning the civic development of cities and towns will look for guidance, it seems to me of the highest importance that we should take hold of this matter now. For that reason I have urged this amendment upon this bill, simply because time is flying, the opportunity may be lost, and these two buildings may go up in the near future without reference to a plan which will be hereafter designed.

I wish to say in this connection that the greatest interest is now being manifested in city planning throughout the United States. In San Francisco, where they neglected the water front for many years—neglected it both from the engineering and the artistic standpoint—they have had a stimulus to action by reason of the magnificent plan that has been developed by the artists and engineers at the recent exposition, where they turned an ugly water front, that was an eyesore to all who saw it, into one of the most beautiful creations that the world has witnessed. That has so impressed the people of that city that they are now moving to take hold of the old water front, at great cost and expense, with a view to remodeling it.

There are 67 cities in the United States which have engaged the services of so-called city-planning engineers. That is becoming now a distinct profession in the United States. I recently witnessed at the city of Philadelphia an exposition at a convention there of the city-planning organization of the United States—a most wonderful exposition—taking up almost half the space in the large city hall with plans that were being designed for the various cities of the United States. Included in those plans the water fronts were being looked after with assiduous attention.

I trust this amendment may be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be accepted. The Senator from Nevada speaks of the sporadic and accidental happenings in regard to the erection of these two plans which have been arranged for by the Government. There is already a sufficient commission and there are already sufficient officials who have looked after these matters. The fact is that the buildings have already been arranged for and the plans have already been made.

There is an appropriation of $80,000 for this fish market. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada proposes to take away $5,000 of that appropriation, and to appropriate it in order that the authorities who now have the matter in charge may collaborate with the Fine Arts Commission. We think that there are a sufficient number looking after this matter now—men who are entirely competent and efficient to do what is needed in regard to it without the collaboration of the Fine Arts Commission.

Besides that, as I have stated, the buildings have already been planned; the amount of money for their construction has been appropriated; and the Senator from Nevada now proposes to upset the whole matter by bringing in a proposition for collaboration with the Fine Arts Commission. There is no necessity for it. There is nothing that will be done under the present plan that will not be done with a view to beautifying the city and looking after the interests generally of the two buildings.

We think the amendment is entirely out of order. In fact, I believe that the point of order should have been sustained against it. As I have said, the amendment proposes to take money that was appropriated for another purpose and devote it to the purpose to which the Senator from Nevada is now asking the Senate to devote it. I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Maryland. I know that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, who has charge of our entire water-front development, regards it as of the highest importance that this expert plan should be made now. I also know that the Fine Arts Commission thinks that it is exceedingly desirable. I wish, further, to state that the Committee on the Library, which has jurisdiction over questions of art, has recently reported a bill providing a design for this particular water front, but we all know that in the present situation of the public business it is utterly impossible to bring such a bill up for action with any hope of success. So we have the authority not only of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and the authority of the Fine Arts Commission as to the necessity of this work, but we also have the authority of the committee of the Senate having jurisdiction over the subject, which has favorably reported a bill on the matter.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am quite in sympathy with the object which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has in view. If the services of such a commission as he calls for in his amendment are necessary to accomplish that object, I am very strongly in favor of his amendment, but the Senator in charge of the bill [Mr. SMITH of Maryland] says that this matter has already been provided for. Should that be true, of course it is unnecessary and unwise to be spending the public money to do the same thing by two different commissions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All I imagine that the Senator from Maryland would claim is that the plans for these two particular buildings have been made, but not the plans for the water front itself upon which the buildings are to rest.

Mr. WORKS. If that be so, I think the provision already made is entirely inadequate and insufficient. The water front of the city of Washington is not pleasing to look at at the present time; that is certain. It seems to me that it is one of the things that ought to have the care and attention of Congress; and in order to bring about such a condition as ought to prevail on the water front, it will have to be done systematically and under some proper guidance and control. If the commission already appointed or the officials who have charge of it are not authorized to do that without the direction suggested by the Senator from Nevada, then I think his amendment ought to be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. [Putting the question.] The Chair can not settle a vote of that kind.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had not intended to say an additional word on this subject, but I feel impelled, in view of the persistency of the Senator from Nevada, to do so.

We have a condition, Mr. President, on the water front of Washington that needs correction. The so-called fish building is a wretched, ramshackle institution. Anyone who goes there to purchase fish or other products that come by water wonders whether or not he ought to make the purchase in view of the insanitary surroundings. The committee feeling that that condition ought to be remedied, an appropriation was secured to rebuild the wharf, and that work is now going on. An additional appropriation was made to construct a modern fish market, such as is found in Boston and in other cities of the country. Sixty thousand dollars of that appropriation are yet to be used. This bill provides for an appropriation of $60,000, which will complete the work.

The river bank, so far as this particular building is concerned, will be improved after modern fashion, the wharves will be modern wharves, and the building will be a beautiful structure.

Now, the Senator from Nevada proposes to take $5,000 out of that appropriation, the full amount of which is requisite to complete the fish market, and to divert it to another purpose, which will, in the very nature of things, halt the work of completing the fish market; in other words, an additional appropriation will have to be made at some time for that purpose.

It does seem to me that the Senator ought not to press his amendment. I am in sympathy with his view of beautifying the river front; but the construction of the fish market and the construction of modern wharves will not affect the object he has in view; and because of that fact, Mr. President, I do hope that the amendment will not be agreed to, but that the Senator from Nevada will find a way to present the subject so as to get a direct appropriation rather than to take it from this fund, which is needed and which has been appropriated for a specific purpose.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I am not well enough informed to know whether the provision mentioned by the chairman of the committee is sufficient to meet the conditions that are intended to be covered by this amendment. Will the Senator from New Hampshire be good enough to explain that situation? I infer from what the Senator has said that the appropriation of $60,000 does not provide generally for a plan for the improvement of the water front, but is confined to certain buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. WORKS. That being so, it seems to me that it is not meeting the object the Senator from Nevada has in view.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill reads:

For completing the construction of market buildings on the site of the present municipal fish wharf and market, including refrigerating and cold-storage plant, which shall be equipped for the accommodation of such retail business as may obtain at that point and shall serve as the wholesale receiving and distributing point for marine and other products to be retailed elsewhere in the District, within the authorized limit of cost, $60,000.

They have already expended a very considerable amount on the wharves and for plans and specifications for the building.

Mr. WORKS. I am not at all objecting to that appropriation, but I was trying to find out whether provision has been made that shall meet the necessities sought to be met by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. GALLINGER. It meets them so far as this stretch is concerned, because we are building a modern wharf and putting modern buildings on that wharf. I do not see how the Art Commission or any other commission is going to improve upon the present project, but if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Nevada it will halt this work, and I do not think it is desirable to halt the work of supplying the city with a modern fish market. If anyone will go down and look at existing conditions, I think he will come to the conclusion that it is rather poor policy to obstruct the work now in progress.

Mr. WORKS. That is quite possible. I did not understand the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Nevada as taking anything away from that appropriation, as the Senator says.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WORKS. I have the amendment now before me. It simply provides for an appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; a point of order was made against that, and the point of order was upheld, and now the Senator from Nevada proposes to take $5,000 from the $60,000 appropriation for the fish market.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I was not present when that took place and was misled in that way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from New Hampshire is in hearty sympathy with the proper development of the water front, as he is in sympathy with every well-directed effort to improve the city of Washington; but I think he underrates the present necessity of immediate action upon this subject.

The Senator's objection is that it takes away $5,000 from an appropriation of $60,000 intended to finish this fish market. While it is true the amendment appropriates a sum not exceeding $5,000, if the entire appropriation is necessary in order to put up this building, doubtless there will have to be a deficiency appropriation made hereafter. However, the cost of construction of such buildings is seldom very accurately measured, and it is quite possible that the total expenditure on this building, for which I believe in all something like $200,000 has been provided, may fall four or five thousand dollars under the total appropriation. In all events, our remedy will be a deficiency appropriation hereafter; but if we wait and delay this water-front improvement we will find that the planning of the fish market, the planning of the wharves, the foundation of that market, and the surroundings of that market may be absolutely out of harmony with the designs which will be hereafter made by an expert body. It seems to me it is only wise forethought for us to have the planning of the water front proceed contemporaneously with the designing and erecting of the contemplated buildings. Let me say that, as I understand, nothing has yet been done on the building itself. Congress has from time to time appropriated various sums for this fish market, but as yet the moneys lie idle for the most part unexpended in the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, the plans are all made, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true; the plans have been made for the fish market.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. And the amount of money necessary to carry it on has been appropriated; and now the Senator wants to divert a part of that money and apply it to a different purpose, so that the Fine Arts Commission may collaborate with a board of engineer officers and architects in planning for the improvement and the development of the entire water front, whereas the appropriation provides merely for a particular improvement. I can see no necessity for it. If it is a necessity, a bill should be brought in to cover it without interfering with the money that has already been appropriated for another purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I will ask him a question, and then will not participate any further in this discussion. Does the Senator from Nevada imagine that the Commission of Fine Arts can improve on the building of a wharf such as is contemplated and such as is appropriated for? Are they going to add some artistic embellishments to an ordinary wharf on the river front?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know what the Fine Arts Commission contemplate. I presume that they will make that a very careful study.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator contemplate having the Fine Arts Commission interfere with the construction of this building, and say that it is not planned along artistic lines, when the plans are already made?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, already under the law the municipal architect who has designed this building, as I understand, has consulted the Commission of Fine Arts with reference to the building itself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And he is now modifying the design of the building itself with reference to their views; so that they are working in harmony.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, why does the Senator want to interfere with the matter further?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Because thus far no authority has been given to plan the water front. There has been authority simply to plan the buildings. I say the improvement is not being carried on in a logical manner.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will repeat my question to the Senator. Does he think that the Commission of Fine Arts can build a wharf better than the officials who have that wharf in charge? What are they going to do about building a wharf?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator, if he will permit me, misapprehends the purpose of this amendment. The central figure of this amendment is the Board of Engineers, of whom the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, an engineer officer, is one.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is a member of the Art Commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. He is secretary of the Art Commission; and Col. Flagler, who is in charge of the entire water front, is one, and the third is to be selected by the Chief of Engineers, and will probably be the Engineer Commissioner of the District.

Now, those men are simply, as they are called upon by existing law, to consult the Commission of Fine Arts regarding the artistic features of the wharf, so that the planning is to be done by engineers.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The Senator says they have already consulted in regard to the building. They can consult in regard to this matter, if they need the advice of those people.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But does not the Senator understand that the planning of the water front is as essential as the planning of the building itself?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, Mr. President, no man—neither it be Col. Flagler, or Col. Harts, or anybody else—has come to the committee and said that we ought to change this appropriation, or that we ought to change the plans for this wharf and this fish market. They have not come to the committee and made complaint. We have heard no complaint whatever, and these appropriations are made. Now, if the Senator wants to halt the work—

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that they have appeared before the Committee on the Library.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not. I am a member of that committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds appeared before that committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not on this subject at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Ah, but incidentally, in connection with another subject; and as the result of the information received by the Committee on the Library, it has authorized an appropriation of $10,000 for this very purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but that appropriation has not yet been made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, that bill can not possibly pass to-day or at this session.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why should we trouble ourselves about it? This is not going to interfere with that. This completes the water front, so far as it goes, just as well as the Commission of Fine Arts can complete it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; and the water front, as completed, may be entirely out of harmony with the beautiful design that I hope will be created.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, can not the Senator accomplish his purpose without using any of this $60,000 at all? The officials that he names in his amendment are all permanent employees of the Government. They are getting their salaries. Why can not the Senator simply direct them to prepare these plans in cooperation with the Fine Arts Commission and provide that the private engineers and architects with whom they consult shall be consulted without compensation? So why could not the Senator accomplish his purpose by simply directing these officers, in the language of his amendment, to prepare these water-front plans and report to the Congress? It seems to me they could go right on and do it, and he would accomplish his purpose without diverting any of the money, and that seems to be the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the purpose of asking this appropriation of $5,000 was to enable this engineering commission to obtain expert advice from engineers who make a specialty of these water-front constructions.

Mr. JONES. Does not the Senator think they could get much, if not all, the advice of that character needed, even without compensation, from those who would expect hereafter, with the improvement of the water fronts, to—

Mr. NEWLANDS. I must say that there is a likelihood of that. The engineers of the country, representatives of the various engineering societies, appeared before the Committee on the Library at the time the power-plant matter was up, and expressed the highest interest in the development of the water front here, and indicated that they would be willing to appoint members from their organization who would take hold of this matter in connection with the Government authorities and give them the advantage of their experience and advice. I had such a provision in my amendment here, and upon the objection of some one—I have forgotten whom; some one of the committee, I think—that it was inadvisable to bring in volunteers; I struck out that provision. Now, I am quite willing to yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Washington that this special appropriation of $5,000 be left out—

Mr. JONES. Yes; I should hate to see that diverted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And authority given to this commission; and then we will rely upon the patriotism of these great engineers, who are experienced in these matters, to give their advice.

Mr. JONES. I think you could very safely rely on that. I should like to see a plan submitted to Congress for the improvement of the water front, but I should hate to see the amount we have appropriated for this building diverted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well, then, Mr. President. I will strike out of this amendment all following the word "necessary," on line 1, page 2, striking out the words:

That so much of the $60,000 above provided for the construction of such market buildings as is necessary, not exceeding $5,000, is appropriated to defray the expenses of the board.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that it will read, how?

Mr. NEWLANDS. So that it will read:

Provided further, That the Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby directed to appoint a board of engineer officers, of which the local district engineer officer in charge of river work at Washington and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall be members, and of which the latter shall be executive and disbursing officer, to collaborate with the Commission of Fine Arts in preparing and reporting to Congress a plan for the artistic and utilitarian development of the commercial water front of Washington, on which the said market buildings are to be constructed; that the board be authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as they deem necessary.

I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada as modified.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. We will accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

Section 6 of the act of July 1, 1902, "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding, after paragraph 2 of said section:

"That the moneys and credits, including moneys loaned and invested, bonds and shares of stock (except the stock of banks and other corporations within the District of Columbia the taxation of which banks and corporations is herein provided for) of any person, firm, association, or corporation resident or engaged in business within said District shall be scheduled and appraised in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of said section 6 for listing and appraisal of tangible personal property, and assessed at their fair cash value, and as taxes on said moneys and credits there shall be paid to the tax collector of said District four-tenths of 1 per cent of the value thereof."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this amendment at any length at all. It does seem to me, however, that there is no good reason why moneys and credits within the District of Columbia should not bear some part of the tax burden. There is undoubtedly within the District a large amount of property of that kind, and I think that that property should bear some part of the burden. I have proposed in this amendment what I deem a very reasonable rate for the taxation of such property—4 mills, or four-tenths of 1 per cent per annum, on the value of that property.

I find on some examination of the taxing systems of other States, such, for example, as Pennsylvania, Maryland, Minnesota, Ohio, and other States where a low rate of taxation is provided for this species of property, that the returns are much greater than where they have attempted to treat such property for taxation purposes under a general property taxation scheme, and where such has been the practice—namely, a low rate—larger revenues have been derived therefrom.

I want to call attention particularly to the law which this proposes to amend. Perhaps it might be urged that this amendment is subject to a point of order. I would not say that it is not subject to a point of order; but a whole revenue law for the District of Columbia was attached to an appropriation bill as it passed in July, 1902, in which a rate was fixed for nearly all classes of property. I call particular attention to the section which this will amend. It is section 6 of the law of 1902. That section relates to the taxation of personal property. It provides the means by which tangible personal property shall be listed and a return thereof made. It is a long section, covering a couple of pages, but paragraph 2 of the section, relating particularly to tangible personal property, is as follows:

On all tangible personal property, assessed at a fair cash value (over and above the exemptions provided in this section), including vessels, ships, boats, tools, implements, horses and other animals, carriages, wagons, and other vehicles, there shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent per annum on the assessed value thereof.

The amendment I propose will follow immediately after that language, and provides for a low rate of tax upon that certain species of intangible property, generally known as moneys and credits.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator state for my benefit, exactly what classes of property this would include?

Mr. STERLING. This includes moneys, which term itself, as I understand it, would include moneys in hand or moneys on deposit. It will include credits of all kinds, as evidenced by book accounts, as evidenced by notes, and it will include also stocks other than the stocks of banks or corporations for which a tax is already provided under the District tax laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will it include bonds?

Mr. STERLING. It will include bonds. It in terms includes bonds.

It has been suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], that this amendment is hardly subject to a point of order. What I said awhile ago was said at some hazard in that regard. It may not be subject to a point of order; but if that point is made, I simply want to emphasize the fact that in 1902 a whole tax law was attached to the appropriation bill. This will not, of course, be in force or effect for the current year, but will be for the ensuing year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a distinct recollection of that matter. That amendment was offered by the late Senator from Michigan, Mr. McMillan, and no point of order was made against it. It was well understood that a point of order would have been sustained had it been made, but it was not. I recall that distinctly.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, without discussing the merits or demerits of this amendment as offered by the Senator, I do not think an appropriation bill is a place for such legislation. Therefore, I make the point of order that this is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suspects he will be able to be understood on this bill. The bill makes appropriations for the expenditures in the District of Columbia. It has had presented in it different ways in which these appropriations are to be paid. There is a House proviso that the revenues raised from taxation of property in the District shall be first applied, and then the Government shall pay the balance. The committee amendment provides that it is to be paid half and half—from the taxation of property in the District of Columbia and half out of the Treasury of the United States. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] provided that all of the property of the District should be turned over to the Government, and the Government should assume the debts of the District, tax the property of the District, and pay all the expenses.

Beyond all question of doubt, to the mind of the Chair—whether he can ever express it so that it can be understood or not, the Chair does not know—taxation is the real question involved. It does not seem to me to make very much difference how it is paid out, after it is once levied, so far as being germane to this bill is concerned. This amendment, I assume, proposes to increase the revenues that may be raised by taxation. Am I correct in that?

Mr. STERLING. That will be the effect of my proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not believe that the point of order is well taken, then, and overrules it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he has modified his amendment so as to limit it to the residents of the District?

Mr. STERLING. I did so modify the amendment, I will say to the Senator from Utah, and confined it to persons and firms and corporations resident in or engaged in business within the District.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I suggested to the Senator, and the reason why I asked the question was that I was not in the Chamber when this amendment was read.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that suggestion was made by the Senator from Utah, and I changed the amendment accordingly.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire pardon the Chair for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. These questions have grown so unusual that in this instance the Chair would like to have an appeal taken, and only ruled because it brings the matter as quickly before the Senate as in any other way.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not rise to take an appeal.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I think I will take an appeal for this reason: I think this is too much of an extension of the principle that the Chair has in mind. I quite understand the logic of the Chair's view; but I do not believe that because the House of Representatives has undertaken to deal in a general way with the question of taxation, and how much the District in the aggregate shall contribute, therefore the field is opened up as to what particular taxes each individual taxpayer in the District shall pay. I think it is an utterly disconnected and utterly illogical sequence. The two ideas are not connected, and they do not necessarily follow one with the other.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, there is not a word or line or syllable in this bill in reference to the matter of taxation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not a word.

Mr. HARDWICK. And as the Senator very kindly suggests, no provision of the House bill changes in the slightest particular the system of levying taxes upon the individual taxpayers of the District of Columbia. Therefore it is perfectly apparent to my mind, although I want to say I am in sympathy with the merits of the amendment—

Mr. GALLINGER. That is fixed by statute.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe it is right that intangible property in the District of Columbia should properly be made to bear its just proportion of the burden of government.

Mr. President, I do believe the danger with which we are faced here is too great an extension in this direction, and once entering the field we are going almost anywhere in it, as we did the other day on the Dental Corps matter; and in the interest of the future proceedings of this body it were well that the deliberate view of the Senate be taken on the matter. For that reason I make the appeal.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to my friend the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. It was stated by the Senator from Georgia that this does not affect individuals. It does affect every individual taxpayer in the city of Washington if the half-and-half system is to be carried out, because under that law the taxpayers of the District are required to pay only one-half of the estimated expenses of the District. If you add to the taxable property, then you reduce the proportionate amount which each taxpayer may pay under that system.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WORKS. The inconsistency of the whole thing is that the statute providing for the assessment and valuation of property is entirely inconsistent with the half-and-half plan. One provides that the taxpayer shall contribute one-half of the estimated expense. That would vary, of course, with the expenses. But, on the other hand, the statute provides for a fixed valuation and a fixed assessment. That can not be varied by the necessities of legislation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but while that is true, if the Senator reflects—

Mr. WORKS. That is true, is it not?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is true, undoubtedly; but, after all, the proposition that is developed by the Senator amounts to this, that while indirectly and consequently the interest of the taxpayer would be affected by this proposition that comes first from the House of Representatives and then from the Senate committee, the fact remains, and it is the all-important fact in my mind and the reason upon which this appeal is based, that the method of collecting taxes, whether the amount raised be great or small, is absolutely untouched in the House provision or in any amendment proposed by the Senate committee.

Mr. WORKS. But, Mr. President, if we are to carry out the spirit and purpose of the half-and-half system, then Congress may find it expedient to reduce the rate of taxation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WORKS. For the reason that the taxpayers are called upon for more than their one-half.

Mr. HARDWICK. But whenever we do it we ought to do it under rules by which the legislation can be carefully considered by the appropriate committee and brought in here and not in connection with the District appropriation bill. It does seem to me the reason is particularly strong why this should not be applied to the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia, as has been pointed out so many times, has no official representative on this floor or in the other body of Congress, and, above all other interests in this country, the interests of this District ought to be the last to be subjected to the dangers of hasty and ill-considered legislation in connection with an appropriation bill.

I do not mean that observation to apply to the amendment of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, because, as I have said, I do not think it is hasty or ill considered. I believe the amendment is just and right. I have always supported that principle of taxation in the State where I reside. I believe it is sound here and everywhere else. But I do not think we can afford to lay down the proposition that we are going into quite such a broad legislative excursion on these appropriation bills with any safety to the general interests of the District and the country in the various bills that are to be considered by this body.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I have learned by very sad experience as a Member of this body and a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia that if we are not able to get hasty and ill-considered legislation we get none for the District of Columbia. That is about the experience that I have had. Therefore I have very little sympathy for the appeal made by the Senator from Georgia that this sort of legislation ought not to be imposed upon the appropriation bill. It is perfectly legitimate that it should be done at this time and upon this bill, as I view it, and I have not the slightest doubt as to the correctness of the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. The observation of the Senator is an arraignment of our committee system and committee work rather than of any great principles. The important principle of all legislative bodies is that there should not be general legislation in connection with appropriation bills. Of course I know the argument has been made that there were rare occasions when it was necessary for the House of Commons in England to assert human liberties. The power over the purse has been used to coerce the Executive into some immediate and necessary reform. But it does not apply in this country. There is no such reason as that back of it, and every other reason that operates against legislation of this kind and character and in this method is in full force in this country, undiminished by any such consideration as some Senators have in mind.

If we have not the proper committee service, it may be because there are too many Senators on too many committees, and Senators have not the time properly to attend to the committee on which they have been appointed and which they attempt to serve. I am not going into that question now, but unless we are going to change our rules, and unless we are prepared to reverse the legislative policy of this country and of this body in all time, as far as I know, I do not think we ought to break down this rule against legislating on appropriation bills. A proposition comes in, and, of course, the Senator who offers it has carefully considered it, but not even the committee has had a fair opportunity to look into it, and the great body of Senators on both sides of the Chamber are absolutely without information and may make mistakes.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I make the appeal, although personally it makes no difference to me what course the Senate takes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the ruling of the Chair is eminently just and wise. The argument of the Senator from Georgia about the danger of proposing legislation on appropriation bills comes to me with a very poor grace at this time, after we have injected more legislation in appropriation bills at this session than ever before. Take the Agricultural appropriation bill, an ordinary appropriation bill. There were three independent schemes of legislation injected into that bill, one in relation to the cotton trade and cotton exchanges, another in reference to grain grading and grain inspection, and a third in reference to warehousing. There were three important independent new schemes of legislation engrafted on that bill by the House of Representatives. After such an experience it seems folly to talk of the danger that would occur to the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia by having this amendment attached to it.

I regard this amendment as one of the most just that has ever been proposed to this bill. It is in the interest of the poor people of this District, men who have a little house, a little bit of real estate. If you make all the wealthy men pay a tax on their credits, assess them as they ought to be, the tendency of it will be to reduce taxation on the poor householders, the poor people of this District who happen to have a piece of ground with a small house upon it. Some of these men are tax shirkers, to my knowledge. They come to the District and settle here because they escape taxation on all their intangible property. If you would make them pay as we do in the States of this country, on their intangible property, as they ought to pay, you would relieve the poor taxpayers of this District who are unfortunate or fortunate enough to own a bit of real estate with a building on it.

I entirely agree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], that as long as you keep up the half-and-half principle this will be a great relief to the poor real estate owners of this District.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it would be a relief to the small property owners if we went further and amended the law that fixes exactly the amount that shall be paid. As the law is now, providing for the assessment of a dollar and a half upon the valuation, this would be no relief whatever to the individual taxpayer. Under the half-and-half system it would be measured by the one-half to be paid by the Government and one-half by the taxpayer. That is the dilemma I am in, and I have been trying to get out of it, and the Senate did not help me.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, let me suggest along the line of the statement made by the Senator from California that this will be something in the nature of an experiment in a good cause, and from the results of the taxation of money and credits we may then conclude that this rate may be lowered and a somewhat different rate fixed for the taxation of tangible property.

I wish to say further, Mr. President, that I had thought in connection with this amendment of going further and exempting from taxation the improvements on real property to the extent of $2,500. But on reflection I thought that might be going a little too far at the present time; that we should try this experiment first and then if we felt justified by the results coming from it it would be proper at another session of Congress to provide for the exemption of improvements on real estate up to a reasonable limit. That would in a great measure relieve the people of moderate means who pay a great share of the taxes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had something to do with preparing the tax laws of the District of Columbia as far back as 1902. The late Senator from Michigan, Mr. McMillan, was the chairman of the committee at that time, and under his immediate direction the tax laws were arranged.

I have been glancing at the tax laws relating to real estate, personal property, and license taxes in the District of Columbia, and if there is any other community on the face of the earth that is taxed to the extent the people of the District of Columbia are taxed I do not know where it exists. They tax absolutely everything here. No man can do business here of any kind that he is not taxed.

The only thing that the committee did not do at that time was to tax what are called intangibles. There is a great difference of opinion as to the propriety of taxing intangibles. They are not taxed in my State, and Mr. President, two years ago we elected a governor who is known as a Progressive. He wanted, of course, to advise the people wisely, and in his inaugural he made some observations about the taxing of intangibles. I want to read a brief sentence from the inaugural of Gov. Spalding, delivered to the New Hampshire Legislature a little less than two years ago. The governor said:

One of the most difficult problems in taxation arises from the fact that under our constitution every class of property either must be taxed at its full value, regardless of the income from it, or must be entirely exempt from taxation. The result is that the tax on bonds and on some mortgages often is more than half of the income from the security. Such a tax is unjust, impossible to collect, inequitable, and unreasonable. Investors can not afford to hold such securities, and are driven to put their money into investments more hazardous but less severely taxed. Thus this tax bears most heavily upon widows, trustees, and others who can least afford to pay it. In other words, it is a rich man's law, pure and simple.

Those are the words of the governor of my State.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota has made a wise provision in his amendment and that is taxing these intangibles at a very low rate of interest. The governor of New Hampshire was discussing, as I read his language, the impropriety of taxing intangibles at the full rate that is placed upon other property. Beyond a question that would result in parties holding those intangibles shifting them from one State to another, from New Hampshire to Massachusetts, from Massachusetts to Connecticut, and so on, and unquestionably it would result in more perjury than we would like to approve of.

Mr. President, feeling as I do that the people of this District are very heavily taxed now, not only the individuals but the corporations, and every man doing business in Washington, no matter whether his business pays or not, is paying a special tax, I think this is rather an inopportune time to impose an additional tax upon the citizens of the District of Columbia.

I want, of course, to have them fairly taxed. We have endeavored to make laws that would accomplish that result; but, however this may be, it does seem to me that the tax laws of the District, which are included in the two little pamphlets I hold in my hand, ought to be taken up seriously by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and if they need revision, revise them, have them brought here, and let us discuss them, but not impose this added tax without a full examination and consideration or put it upon an appropriation bill.

I never like to dissent from the views held by the Chair, who, as I have several times said, undoubtedly means to rule according to our code of rules, but I do feel that this is general legislation; it changes our tax laws; and the appeal which has been taken from the Chair ought to be sustained. But, whether it is sustained or not, Mr. President, I do hope the Senate in its wisdom will feel, as I do, that it would be much better to have this matter taken up by the appropriate committee, have hearings on it, give it full consideration, and report their conclusions to Congress, under which circumstances I have no doubt the conclusions reached by the committee would be acceded to by this body without dissent.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I trust that the decision of the Chair will not be overruled. In the first place, I believe that the decision of the Chair is eminently correct and in accordance with the rule.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] called attention to the fact that it affects existing law. The point of order made by the chairman of the committee is that it is general legislation. If we would follow the argument of the Senator from Georgia—

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, my use of that word was inapt. I meant that the amendment, of course, changes the existing law and is general legislation. The Senator need not make any specific point on that phrase.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that it changes the existing law.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a change of general existing law and it is general legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. It is carrying out existing law. It does not increase the appropriation. There has been no point of order against it except that it is general legislation. If this is general legislation, Mr. President, then the bill is full of provisions against which a point of order could be made and which ought to go out. I find on page 15 of the bill the following:

Enforcement of child-labor law: For the enforcement of the provisions of the act "To regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia," approved May 28, 1908, namely, for two inspectors, at $1,200 each, $2,400: Provided, That the existing provision of law requiring the detail of two privates of the Metropolitan police force for the enforcement of said act is hereby repealed.

That repeals the statute. It does more than that. It increases the appropriation. The pending amendment provides means whereby taxes shall be raised in the District of Columbia. Every item where an appropriation is increased affects the taxation of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRONNA. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The argument that there is some other provision in the bill that is subject to a point of order and no Senator cared to make it and did not invite the attention of the Senate to it does not add any force to the situation.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not arguing that it has any force. Because no point of order has been raised against that particular item is no reason why this should be subject to a point of order. It has not been clearly shown to me that this is general legislation. It affects one thing and one thing only, and that is the revenues of the District derived from taxation.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator, however, that those two salaries were estimated for when they were put in the bill by the committee. They were estimated for by the commissioners in the bill as it came over from the other House.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to congratulate the Chair upon the ruling. I think he is eminently correct. I shall not take the time of the Senate to argue the merits of the case, but if an appeal is taken from the ruling of the Chair I shall vote to sustain the Chair.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Georgia, if he is so satisfied with the merits of this amendment, might waive any technicality in regard to the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me, I should be perfectly willing to do so if I were not afraid that the Senate is drifting too far on this question. So far as this particular case is concerned, I would be glad to do it; but the Chair invited this appeal, and, I think, wisely. If the Senate is going to absolutely abolish its rule, we had just as well know it and act accordingly. If not, we had better enforce it once in a while anyway.

Mr. STERLING. I am glad the Senator from Georgia again calls attention to the fact that he thinks we are drifting too far from the purpose of the appropriation bill and that this is a bad precedent. This is no precedent at all, Mr. President; but the real precedent may be found in the appropriation bill of 1902, to which was attached an entire revision of the taxing laws of the District, beginning with the taxation of real estate, and then from taxation of tangible personal property on down to the stock and gross receipts of corporations, with at last a complete license-tax law, which were all added to the appropriation bill of 1902.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want to interfere with his argument, but I am interested in this question. The difference is that in the case referred to by the Senator the committee worked on that proposition for days and weeks and months, and, I am informed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the committee gave it careful, serious, and well-matured consideration, whereas in the case presented by the Senator the proposition is sprung on the floor of the Senate; it has had no committee consideration whatever, and it is entitled to consideration because it is a very difficult question.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has already agreed that the amendment is a meritorious amendment; further, it involves no such consideration as the amendment to the 1902 appropriation bill involved, which, as I say, was a complete revision of the tax laws of the District. It is one plain, simple proposition for the taxation of moneys and credits. I have tried to be careful in the drawing of the amendment, so that I think it will conflict with no other law and will tax for a second time no property that has been already taxed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota permit an interruption?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not looked up the matter, but my recollection is that the law of 1902 passed the Senate before it was attached to the appropriation bill. That is my impression.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know as to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is correct. But notwithstanding that does not alter the argument of the Senator. I am very clear in my opinion that the Senate gave its concurrence to the legislation as it had been prepared by the Committee on the District of Columbia. Of course that has no bearing on the question now at issue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate?

Mr. STERLING. On that question I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, as I stated when I made the point of order in regard to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. STERLING], I did not do so with a view to either the merits or the demerits of the amendment. As I then stated, however, I do not think that it is the proper place on an appropriation bill to legislate on a subject of this kind proposing to apportion the amount of taxes that should be made, although such a proposition in itself may be entirely right. I believe in taxing people according to their wealth.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Maryland will pardon me for the suggestion, how can the Senator from Maryland tell that the arbitrary figure of four-tenths of 1 per cent is the right figure?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I was just going on to remark that I did not know what is the mode of taxation proposed. I do not know how much the Senator proposes to tax or how little he proposes to tax. The tax may be too much or it may be too little. Mr. President, I do not think that the floor of the Senate is the place for any Senator to get up and to give his judgment as to the amount of tax that should be imposed upon people, be it right or be it wrong; but I do say that it is a matter that should have full consideration as to the amount and the manner of the imposition of the tax. I repeat I do not think an appropriation bill is the proper place for legislation of so important a character as this.

It is not that I am opposing the legislation. As I previously stated, I believe people ought to be taxed according to their wealth, but it ought to be done in an orderly way, after proper consideration, after the proposed legislation is properly digested, and not on the judgment of one Senator, be he ever so wise; which I do not question. Such legislation ought to be framed in a committee, properly considered by them, and properly considered by the Senate after the rate of taxation which is proposed to be put upon the people shall have been made known.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on yesterday I voted to sustain the ruling of the Chair on the theory that this is not a general appropriation bill. To my mind, the only way that the ruling of the Chair can be sustained to-day is on the theory that it is not a general appropriation bill, and for that reason I shall vote to sustain the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to say, in explanation of my vote, that I cast my vote as I did because I believed the proposition would not only be new legislation but would be a change of existing law. So far as the main question is concerned—the matter of taxing intangible property—I firmly believe in the principle and have always advocated it; and if the proposition of taxing intangible property comes before the Senate in any proper form I shall be glad to vote for it. I simply make this statement to explain my vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say to the Senator that I am very much in the same position on the merits of this question as the Senator is; but here a Senator comes in and from the floor of the Senate suggests an amendment fixing a specific rate of four-tenths of 1 per cent without any showing whatever as to why that is the right rate, without any consideration by the committee as to what is the proper rate. How can we vote—even those of us who favor this system—for a specific proposition of that sort under circumstances like that? The matter ought to be considered by the committee.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I stated in my remarks that I would vote or any proper amendment, now that it has been ruled in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator of course understands that I was not criticizing his statement; but I wanted to bring that situation to the attention of the Senate in connection with his statement.

Mr. REED. I desire to add that the reason why I am not familiar with this particular matter is because it has been necessary for me to be absent in my committee room at work; but I am earnestly in favor of any proposition that will fix a just and proper tax upon intangible property. I did not entertain the view that the amendment was in order, and I believed it necessary, in order to sustain the rules of the Senate, to overrule the decision of the Vice President. The majority of the Senate, however, has ruled the amendment to be in order, and that settles the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I dislike to delay the consideration of this bill, and yet there is one matter which I think ought to go in the Record.

The joint committee in their report gave it as their opinion that the people of the District of Columbia were paying a fair and just rate of taxation. Now, I want to ask the Senators, whether intangible property is taxed or not in their States, if they have a license tax for doing business also; and, while awaiting a reply later on, I want to call attention to what the committee did in 1902 in making up the present tax laws for the District of Columbia. They imposed pretty heavy taxes on all the corporations of the District and then they added a code of license taxes which certainly do not apply in my State. I do not know how it may be in others. I will read a few paragraphs from the law of 1902:

That cattle dealers shall pay a license tax of $15 per annum.

That proprietors or owners of hacks, coaches, omnibuses, carriages, wagons, and other passenger vehicles for hire shall pay license taxes as follows: Vehicles drawn by one animal, $6 per annum; automobiles, electromobles, or other horseless vehicles by whatever name called, and vehicles drawn by more than one animal, $9 per annum.

That proprietors or owners of livery stables shall pay license taxes as follows: For stables containing 10 stalls or less, $25 per annum, and $2 per annum additional for each stall in addition to 10.

That proprietors or owners of establishments where automobiles of any pattern, description, or motor power whatsoever are kept for hire or are kept or stored for others, for profit or gain, shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum for 10 vehicles or less and $2 additional for each vehicle in addition to 10.

That persons, firms, or corporations operating vehicles for hire or for the transportation of passengers in the District of Columbia with sufficient regularity to enable the public to take passage therein at any point intermediate to the stable or stand of such vehicle, or operate such vehicle over a route sufficiently definite to enable the public to ascertain the streets and avenues on which such vehicle can be found en route, shall pay license taxes as follows: For each vehicle with a seating capacity not to exceed 10 passengers, $6 per annum; for each vehicle with a seating capacity exceeding 10 passengers, $12 per annum.

That real estate brokers or agents shall pay a license tax of $50 per annum.

That persons, firms, corporations, or associations transacting the business of the purchase or sale of securities, stocks, shares, or certificates, based upon an estimated value after a lapse of a certain period of time, or who undertake to guarantee the holder of said securities, stocks, shares, or certificates certain sums of money based upon investments after the lapse of a certain time, or who promise to divide with the holders or investors of said securities, stocks, shares, or certificates, or with the heirs or assigns of such holders or investors, any profit which may accrue from their investments at maturity, shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum.

That railroad ticket brokers shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum.

Proprietors of hotels shall pay annually $1 for each room provided for the accommodation of guests.

That victualers, owners of restaurants, oyster houses, cookshops, ice-cream parlors, dairy lunches, or eating houses, by whatsoever name designated, where food, meals, or refreshments are served to transient customers, to be eaten on the premises where sold, shall pay a license tax of $18 per annum.

That owners, lessees, or managers of theaters having a stage and movable scenery used for the purpose of acting, performing, or playing any play, farce, interlude, opera, or other theatrical or dramatic performance, or any scene, section, or portion of any play, farce, burlesque, or drama of any description, for gain, shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum: Provided, That licenses may be granted for theatrical performances for one week on the payment of $20, and for less than one week on the payment of $10: And provided further, That the proprietors of buildings, other than theaters, where exhibitions, lectures, or entertainments of any description are conducted for gain shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum; or for lesser periods as follows: Three dollars per day, or $10 for the first week, and $5 for each subsequent consecutive week: And provided further, That for entertainments, concerts, or performances of any kind given in church premises or private residences where the proceeds are intended for church or charitable purposes, and where no rental is charged, no license tax shall be required.

That every person who exhibits paintings, pictures, or works of art, or makes industrial, mechanical, agricultural, food, or floral exhibitions, including cattle and poultry shows, freaks and museum attractions, side shows, and all other lawful exhibitions not otherwise provided for, shall pay a license tax of $3 per day, or $10 for the first week and $5 additional for each subsequent consecutive week, and for an annual license the tax shall be $100.

That persons conducting concerts, entertainments, or balls to which an admission fee is charged, directly or indirectly, shall pay a license tax of $3 for each day or night.

That proprietors or owners of any circus shall pay a license tax of $200 per day.

That owners or lessees of grounds used for horse racing, tournaments, athletic sports, baseball, football, polo, golf, and kindred games, or where feats of horsemanship are performed, to which admission fees are charged or which are used for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, shall pay a license tax of $20 per week or $5 per day.

That owners or lessees of grounds or premises used for picnics or lawn fetes, or resorts where theatrical or musical attractions or other amusements are presented, to which admission fees are charged or which are used for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, and which are not taxed under any other paragraph of this section, shall pay a license tax of $3 per day, or $10 per week, and $5 additional for each subsequent consecutive week, or for an annual license tax of $100.

That owners or lessees of buildings used for skating rinks, fairs, carnivals, or amusements not otherwise provided for in this section shall pay a license tax of $3 per day, or $10 for the first week and $5 additional for each subsequent consecutive week, or for an annual license a tax of $100.

That owners or lessees of shooting galleries, fencing schools, public gymnasiums, places where firearms of any description are used, or schools where the art of self-defense is taught shall pay a license tax of $12 per annum.

That proprietors or owners of apparatus or machines known as merry-go-rounds, flying horses, or similar devices for amusement shall pay a license tax of $12 for the first week and $10 for each subsequent consecutive week, or $3 per diem: Provided, That license therefor may be refused in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

That proprietors or owners of slot or automatic machines, so called (telephones excepted), by which objects, pictures, or figures are presented to public view or musical or vocal exhibitions are automatically given on the deposit of money or metal, or where a pecuniary consideration is received for the use of said apparatus or machines, shall pay a license tax of $2 per annum for each machine or apparatus.

That owners or managers of Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum.

That owners or managers of massage establishments shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum.

That mediums, clairvoyants, soothsayers, fortune tellers, or palmists, by whatsoever name called, conducting business for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, when permitted to practice their calling in the District of Columbia, shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum.

That fuel hucksters shall pay a license tax of $5 per annum for each vehicle used in the conduct of their business.

That peddlers shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum.

That brewers or manufacturers of fermented liquors of any description for sale, and brewers' agents, shall pay a license tax of $250 per annum.

That billposters and persons engaged in the business of painting or placing signs or advertisements on land, buildings, billboards, fences, or other structures in the District of Columbia visible from a street or other public space shall pay an annual tax of $20 before engaging in said business.

That owners or lessees of any buildings, structures, or tanks used for the storage of any description of inflammable oils in quantities exceeding five barrels shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum and shall have the approval of the fire marshal before license is granted.

That owners or lessees of laundries operated otherwise than by hand power shall pay a license tax of $20 per annum. Owners or lessees of laundries operated by hand labor shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum.

That proprietors or owners of intelligence offices, information bureaus, registries, or employment offices, by whatsoever name called, shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum.

That dealers in second-hand personal property shall pay a license tax of $40 per annum.

An annual license tax is hereby imposed upon the following classes of business, trades, and professions, namely: Boarding houses (public), $1 per room; claim agents, $25; building and other contractors, $25; carriage or wagon making establishments, $25; cigar dealers, $12; confectionery establishments, $12; dealers of every description in the several markets, except farmers and producers, $5; florists, $15; land and improvement companies, $50; undertaking establishments, $25.

And please remember that these taxes are in addition to taxes on real estate and personal property.

Mr. President, I venture to say that there is not a community in this country that has a code of laws governing the payment of license taxes that equals that which is imposed upon the District of Columbia. I think the license taxes are unjust and indefensible.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I generally find myself in accord with the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire; but I am afraid that in this instance he has overlooked the fact that the pending amendment would be a help to the class of people he has enumerated.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be a help to them if the license taxes are repealed, but not otherwise.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me, I believe that we will all agree that if the pending amendment becomes a law it will simply tax a few of the tax-dodgers, a few of the people who come here purposely to evade taxation; and not 1 per cent of the class of people whom the Senator from New Hampshire has enumerated would be affected by the pending amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is wrong about that. As the Governor of New Hampshire pointed out, a law of this kind does not touch only the rich. It touches widows, it touches trustees, it touches every man who has accumulated a little something of this world's goods. While I am not especially hostile to the law, yet I wanted to put in the Record the fact that outside of intangibles we have not overlooked the matter of taxing the people of this District adequately. In fact, the tax laws of this District are extreme—so extreme that I venture to say there is no State in the Union that has laws that compare with them.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me further—

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I said that it would not affect them. It would affect them, but it would be for their benefit, because the man who has money to loan, the man who has unlimited credit, can afford to pay four-tenths of 1 per cent. It is a low tax, and it ought to be imposed. The Government of the District of Columbia has been going on for 140 years, and not up to this time has intangible property been assessed; and it is an assistance and a help to the poor fellows who have only a home. That is why I am in favor of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The government of the District of Columbia has had the same experience that the State of New Hampshire has had because we do not tax intangibles.

Mr. President, I do not want to get into a controversy on this matter. I simply wanted to say that the Committees on the District of Columbia have not been unmindful of the fact that the citizens of this District ought to be adequately taxed. I will repeat, and then I will conclude, that outside of intangibles I contend that there is no State in the American Union that has such stringent and such severe tax laws as has the District of Columbia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota, who introduced this amendment, a question or two for the purpose of eliciting some information. Why is it that the Senator fixes the rate at 4 mills?

Mr. STERLING. I fix that as the rate, Mr. President, for the simple reason that more revenue will be produced by a low flat rate of taxation on moneys and credits than by a higher rate, as has been demonstrated by the experience of different States that have tried it. The tendency is, if moneys and credits are taxed at the same rate as other personal property, as they are taxed in many States, for moneys and credits to escape taxation, they will go into hiding, or investment of such money will be sought in other States where the tax is not so burdensome.

Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that in South Dakota we have experienced great difficulty in the taxation of moneys and credits, for the simple reason that under our constitution no classification of personal property according to the uses of the property, according to the question as to whether it will escape taxation or not, is permitted; but all property, real and personal, must be taxed under our constitution at the same uniform rate. The result is that very little revenue is derived from the taxation of moneys and credits, and because of that an amendment to the constitution of South Dakota is submitted now to the voters of that State, to be voted on at the November election, so as to permit the legislature to classify personal property and permit a lower rate for this particular species of property.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if I am correct in my assumption that this is his amendment now under discussion? I read the body of it:

That the moneys and credits, including moneys loaned and invested, bonds and shares of stock (except the stock of banks and other corporations within the District of Columbia the taxation of which banks and corporations is herein provided for) of any person, firm, association, or corporation resident or engaged in business within said District shall be scheduled and appraised in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of said section 6 for listing and appraisal of tangible personal property, and assessed at their fair cash value, and as taxes on said moneys and credits there shall be paid to the tax collector of said District four-tenths of 1 per cent of the value thereof.

That is the Senator's amendment, is it not?

Mr. STERLING. That is it.

Mr. REED. Now, what is the present levy upon personal property in the District?

Mr. STERLING. It is one and five-tenths per cent, or a dollar and a half per hundred.

Mr. REED. And at the present time every honest man within the District makes a return of his moneys, his credits, his stocks, and his bonds to the assessor.

Mr. STERLING. No; let me say the Senator from Missouri is mistaken in that regard. There is no tax on moneys and credits.

Mr. REED. Is there not a tax on personal property?

Mr. STERLING. There is a tax on tangible personal property, but the law provides for the tax on tangible personal property. I will read the paragraph relating to that. My amendment is intended to follow this paragraph in regard to the taxation of tangible personal property. Paragraph 2 of section 6 of the act reads:

PAR. 2. On all tangible personal property, assessed at a fair cash value (over and above the exemptions provided in this section), including vessels, ships, boats, tools, implements, horses, and other animals, carriages, wagons, and other vehicles, there shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia 1½ per cent on the assessed value thereof.

Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator please, so that I may get the point clear in my own mind, I am not asking these questions, I will say, in a spirit of controversy—

Mr. STERLING. I understand.

Mr. REED. But to get the fact. The Senator informs the Senate that as the law now stands if a man has $10,000 in his possession he is not obliged to make a return of it?

Mr. STERLING. I do. I so understand the law.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that cash in hand is not tangible property?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it is ordinarily so termed.

Mr. REED. Has it been decided here by any court in the District of Columbia that cash in hand is intangible property?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think any case has ever arisen in the District of Columbia, at least, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, in which that question has been tested, but money is ordinarily not classed as tangible property.

Mr. REED. The Senator, I think, is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STERLING. I am a member of the District Committee.

Mr. REED. The point I am trying to get at is this: If under the law as it stands now the various properties specified in the amendment are taxable, then they are taxable at 1½ per cent. The Senator's amendment would reduce that tax to four-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. REED. I confess it astonishes me if the term "tangible property" has been construed either by the courts or by the officers of the District so that it excludes money, bonds, notes, stock, or other property of that kind, because as I have always understood the term—

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Let me finish the sentence. As I have always understood the term "intangible property" it was held to apply to such things as franchises, easements, good will, and so forth, but notes, bonds, stocks, and cash are tangible property.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was going to ask the Senator that very question. I am not a lawyer and I am only asking for information, but I thought that cash and just those things the Senator describes, stocks and bonds, were always intangible property.

Mr. REED. They would not be so construed in my part of the country.

Mr. LIPPITT. It would in mine. I should like to say to the Senator that Rhode Island has been trying a rather interesting experiment along this line during the last three or four years. We had a tax of 1½ per cent on personal property. The tax was reduced to the rate the Senator from South Dakota is now proposing, four-tenths of 1 per cent, I think about four years ago. The result has been that the tax has met with the very great approval of the people of the State, and we are actually getting more revenue from the lower tax than we obtained from the higher one. Such things as the Senator describes have been included as intangible property.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that it is unnecessary to discuss the technical question whether this is intangible property or not. As a matter of fact they have not assessed it or taxed it in this city. That is the real question.

Mr. REED. The Senator is correct. That is the real question, and that is what I have been trying to get at, although I wandered far enough from the subject to express my opinion in regard to the term. I have been interested in eliciting information as to whether this property is taxable under the present law and is in fact being taxed.

Mr. STERLING. No.

Mr. REED. The information I obtain is that this class of property is now not taxed at all. Therefore, the sole question that is presented now, since this amendment has been ruled in order, is whether the rate is a just and a proper rate. I am perfectly willing to concede, without regard to the question if it should be wise or not, that 4 mills on the dollar is a good deal better than no mill on the dollar.

Mr. STERLING. Let me just say a word, Mr. President, partly in answer to the Senator from Missouri; and first in regard to the definition and what is included under the term moneys and credits. I assert that all administrators of tax laws consider moneys and credits, whether the money be cash in hand or whether it be money on deposit in the bank, and all credits such as book accounts, notes, bonds, and so forth, as intangible property. I read from an article by J. G. Armson, a member of the Minnesota Tax Commission. He says:

"Money," as defined in the law, includes all forms of currency in common use, whether in hand or on deposit in a bank.

"Credits" include book accounts, notes, bonds, rents, annuities, and mortgages upon which the mortgage registry tax has not been paid, and all other claims or demands for money or other valuable thing.

That is the definition of credits.

Mr. CLAPP. If I may interrupt, bearing on the rate, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that in our State by a special provision we levied a tax on this kind of property and we fixed a rate of 3 mills.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that in the State of Missouri we have a tax on moneys, stocks, bonds, and so forth, and we get a very large return, at the same rate at which everything else is taxed, but I suppose that could be easily accounted for by the fact that the people of the State of Missouri generally are honest.

Mr. STERLING. I suppose so. Now, with reference to the rate and the reasons for the rate I will give the results of the low rate in Pennsylvania. Under a 4-mill tax, just such a tax as is provided for by this amendment, the intangible property listed steadily increased from $145,300,000 in 1885, through all the years down to 1913, when the total amount of moneys and credits listed was $1,402,000,000. I think the results have proven equally as good in Maryland and also in the State of Minnesota. In Maryland the amount listed for taxation of this kind of property increased from $6,000,000 in 1896 to $192,000,000 in 1914. I have somewhere the figures showing the additions to the tax rolls under the Minnesota law imposing a 3-mill tax where the results are equally striking.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator in that book the amount returned in the State of Missouri?

Mr. STERLING. No; I have not.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I confess the idea of one rate on one class of property and another rate on another class of property is something quite new to me. Can the Senator tell us how prevalent that method of taxation has become?

Mr. STERLING. No; I can not say exactly how prevalent it has become, but it is in vogue in Pennsylvania, in Maryland, and Minnesota, the three States I have named. I will say to the Senator I believe the tendency is to change the laws and to change even constitutional provisions where they are a bar to any classification of personal property so that a lower rate may be imposed upon this particular class of property.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will yield to me, I will say to the Senator from Montana, as he has asked the question, that a similar question came up in the discussion of this bill last year or the year before, and at that time I put into the RECORD quotations from a book that was written by a professor at Columbia College who is one of the great students of the subject of taxation, in which he very strongly advocated the abolition of what is usually known as the general tax—that is, a uniform tax on all classes of property—and very strongly advocated the adoption of the class of taxation which has been proposed in this amendment.

There is, as the Senator probably knows, a conference of the men interested in taxation in the various States that meets annually in the United States and publish very interesting and very elaborate reports and essays on the subject of taxation. I have read them only casually, but the whole tendency of the thought of those men who are making a study of it is that the general tax is unjust, and I think they would say antiquated, and that all the modern tendency is in the line of the proposition that is covered by the amendment we now have before the Senate.

In addition to the States that the Senator has mentioned, as I said a minute ago, the State of Rhode Island about four years ago appointed a tax commission. The whole subject was very elaborately and exhaustively studied, and as a result of it they adopted this system of a graduated tax.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator from Rhode Island, and if I misunderstood him I should be glad to be corrected, to say that the rate of taxation on all personal property in the State of Rhode Island had been fixed at four-tenths, so that tangible personal property paid taxes of exactly the same rate as intangible personal property.

Mr. LIPPITT. No; I think it is the intangible, if I recollect it aright.

Mr. WALSH. Am I to understand then that in the State of Rhode Island they have a rate of taxation of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on tangible property and a rate of four-tenths of 1 per cent on intangible property?

Mr. LIPPITT. That is the way I recollect it. I think it is practically the same system that is proposed for the District of Columbia. I only stated that inasmuch as the Senator was asking something about the trend of thought on this subject.

Mr. WALSH. I had supposed until now that there was a practical unanimity in taxation on the principle that all taxes shall be uniform on all classes of property.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator is in error on that subject. I think just the opposite is the most advanced thought on the subject of taxation.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if he has at hand the provisions of the statutes of the different States to which he refers, Pennsylvania and Maryland and Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. I have not the provisions of those statutes, I will say to the Senator, but I know those are the rates fixed for that class of property. A moment ago I stated the results both in Maryland and in Pennsylvania of the 4-mill rate of taxation upon this kind of property.

Mr. WALSH. With the permission then of the Senator from South Dakota, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maryland, how the system operates in that State.

Mr. STERLING. Will not the Senator permit me, before that is answered, to call attention to another phase of the Senator's remarks? He seems to think that a system which imposes a uniform tax on all species of property is desirable and to be approved of. I will say to the Senator again I know that the tendency is to get away from that condition. We have suffered from it in our own State. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the constitutional provision in South Dakota, which we are now trying to amend, and I trust will, at the next general election amend. This is the provision—

Mr. WALSH. Of course the Senator knows I had some familiarity with it at one time.

Mr. STERLING. I know the Senator did, and probably does now, but it may not be amiss to call the attention of the Senate to it. There is a disposition to amend constitutions which are like this in regard to the taxation of property:

2. All taxes to be raised in this State shall be uniform on all real and personal property, according to its value in money, to be ascertained by such rules of appraisal and assessment as may be prescribed by the legislature by general law, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property. And the legislature shall provide by general law for the assessing and levying of taxes on all corporation property, as near as may be, by the same methods as are provided for assessing and levying of taxes on individual property.

The result of a provision like that is that if a man has $5,000 in moneys and credits and the tax is 5 per cent to 7 per cent, as it has been in certain counties in South Dakota in the last four or five years, that would be a great burden to be borne by the man who might have this amount for investment in a loan, for example, the requirement being that such property must be assessed at its full value. The result would be that the interest which he could procure on his $5,000 would hardly exceed the amount of taxes that he would have to pay.

Mr. WALSH. But is it not true that the man who put his $5,000 in cattle would be obliged to pay at the higher rate, and why should you give an advantage to the man who loans his $5,000 on a safe security over the man who contributes to the development of the country by buying $5,000 worth of cattle and going into the cattle business?

Mr. STERLING. I am not contending that he should be given the advantage. I think that he should stand on an equal ground with the man who has the money invested in tangible property, real or personal, so far as that is concerned. But it is a question of business largely and what business will incline to do; and with that excessive tax upon that kind of property there will be none of it listed for purposes of taxation.

Mr. WALSH. Just one other question, and then I am through. Is it not the trouble with intangible property that it is ordinarily beyond the ken of the assessor so that he does not find it at all? Is not that the trouble with that system, and will that trouble not inhere in it notwithstanding the rate?

Mr. STERLING. Not to the extent that it does with the excessive rate. In such a case—the rate being low—the man who has the money for investment and has his money invested in loans would be required to pay what would amount to a reasonable tax on the income that he would derive from that money. He will make a return, and the property will get on the assessment roll and bear a just proportion of the taxes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Are there not two other grounds for assessing this kind of property in this way? First, it is on the same principle that we put a very low rate on uncut diamonds. We found by experience in the tariff law that if we put a high rate of duty it would lead to smuggling, and we would secure little or no revenue, and by putting on a very low duty we collect it and get a good deal. So with this intangible property if we put a moderate tax on it we will get a tax out of all of it.

Then, in the next place, there is this distinction. I have never known in my experience where tangible property like horses, cattle, cows, sheep, farm implements, or anything of that kind is ever assessed up to its full maximum value. If you take money and assess it intrinsically you can only assess $100 up to $100; but a horse that may be worth $200 is oftentimes put down on the assessment roll at $50 to $75, and there is the same proportion in the case of a cow, the same proportion in the case of a sheep, the same proportion in the case of agricultural implements.

Now, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me a little further?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I was glad that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] read the schedule of occupation taxes in the District of Columbia. It showed what an utterly unjust tax it is in many respects. There was one curious thing about it—there was no occupation tax for a coupon clipper. Men who live by clipping coupons have no occupation tax to pay, but everybody else—the poor widow who keeps a boarding house or a poor fellow who keeps a restaurant—must pay a tax. Almost all those occupation taxes are unfair or unjust. How much more righteous would it not be to collect taxes on this intangible property?

The Senator speaks of the poor widow. I know by reputation several poor widows who have residences here in Washington who are here part of the year and part of the year at some watering places. It would be a cruel thing to impose a tax on the credit of those poor widows, would it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says they never tax horses, cattle, and farm implements at their full value. Does the State of Minnesota require that the inventory shall be sworn to by the taxpayer?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; but the law says the property shall only be assessed, my recollection is, at three-fourths of its actual value.

Mr. GALLINGER. That must apply to all taxes, not alone to horses.

Mr. NELSON. It is the same in reference to real estate. If the Senator will allow me, let us see what a great injustice is perpetrated on the people of the District of Columbia by the present system. Of this class of occupation taxes that the Senator read, while some of them may be justified, a lot of them relate to poor people. Wealthy men who have their money invested in stocks and bonds do not run boarding houses; they do not run pool tables; they do not run restaurants; they do nothing of the kind. They do not keep their money in operation except to earn interest and to clip coupons.

If you adopt this system of taxing intangible property, as we do in the States, taxing it fairly, it may hit a few of the wealthy widows; but what if it does, they can stand it. If you get those taxes assessed under this amendment, the poor fellows who follow the occupations that are taxed can be relieved of that tax, and besides you may reduce the tax on real estate in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NELSON. Why should this intangible property escape taxation?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not arguing that with the Senator, but I want to call attention—

Mr. NELSON. I want to give a little experience, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow me? What I wanted to do was to state that my reference to the widows was the language of the governor of New Hampshire.

Mr. NELSON. I do not criticize the Senator for that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The governor called attention not only to the widows but to trustees who are holding this class of property as being poor, or comparatively poor, people; that was all.

Mr. NELSON. I want to give a little of my own experience. Many years ago when I was a Member of the House there was a gentleman who owned real estate in various counties in Minnesota. He is dead now, and there is no harm to mention his name. His name was Balcom. He had no children. He was all the time buying tax titles. He all the time thought they taxed his land too high, and he let it go at a tax sale. I was his attorney in many of those instances, and I got acquainted with his ways. When I was a Member of the House he used to come down here in the winter with his wife and stay in Washington. They did that for several winters. I said, "Mr. Balcom, why do you stay here? Why do you not go to your home?" He said, "I spend a part of the time in Philadelphia and a part here, because this is the only place where I can come that my notes and bonds are not taxed. If I went to Minnesota you would be as hard on me on these intangible things as you have been on my real estate."

Now, that is the kind of man we want to reach. I am sorry to see my genial friend from New Hampshire, who is generally right on all questions and who always acts in good faith, take the different view of this matter. I can hardly account for it. But he tells us, in his State, if I understood him correctly, they have no such taxes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. NELSON. Therefore I do not wonder at the fact that he is not in favor of these taxes. He has not been brought up to it. It is like a child that has been brought up on corn bread; it does not like to depend on wheat bread or anything of that kind.

Now, I want to say to Senators in all candor the way I feel about this matter. I feel that this intangible property, moneys and credit, should be taxed, as they are in most of the States of the Northwest and the West and most of the States except perhaps in New England. Now, I am not hostile to those gentlemen; I am not hostile even to those rich widows; but if you make those people pay something on their credit you can remove some of the unfairness that exists in the system of taxation in the District of Columbia.

The idea of making a poor widow, with a family of children, who rents a house, takes in lodgers, and keeps a boarding house, pay a tax, and a poor fellow who is crippled and not able to do any manual labor, who runs a little restaurant or a pool table—the idea of taxing that kind of people and then exempting from taxation the millionaires, who are fortunate enough to have their property in the shape of credits and money and not in tangible property, seems to me monstrous, indeed.

This evil should be corrected; this class of property should be taxed. I agree with the Senator from South Dakota that in view of the character of the property his rate of taxation is fair, and if you enforce that rate of taxation in the District of Columbia you can reduce the taxes on real estate and can eliminate many of these wicked occupation taxes, which ought not to be on our statute books.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the portion of his amendment where it provides that these intangibles "shall be scheduled and appraised in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of said section 6 for listing and appraisal of tangible personal property."

It has occurred to me that this will give rise to a difficulty in the administration of this proposed law which may possibly prove disastrous to its operation. The claim made in every State, so far as I know, is that this class of property has escaped taxation because the owners of it refuse to disclose of what it consists—the class of investments, specifically—for examination by assessors and appraisers; in other words, they refuse to disclose all the secrets of their wealth, the classes of their investments, the persons affected by them, and matters of that character. So such property fails to come within the purview of the tax system of the States.

It seems to me that under the phraseology of the amendment it will require every capitalist—I use the word "capitalist" because I suppose this is intended to reach the capitalists—it will require every capitalist to lay out his securities before the individual assessors of this District and to have every investment appraised at its cash value by the assessor of this District.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think that will be the requirement.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think that is just what the law now requires.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Vermont will refer to the provisions of section 1 of the law in regard to the returns to be made by the individual or the corporation in regard to tangible personal property, he will find that there is no such requirement as that. If the Senator will permit me, I will read it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. STERLING. Beginning in section 6, about the middle of page 4, the provision is:

That hereafter the assessor of the District of Columbia, or his successor in office, shall annually cause to be prepared a printed blank schedule of all tangible personal property and all general merchandise or stock in trade, owned or held in trust or otherwise, subject to taxation under the provisions of this section, and of the classes of corporations and companies to be assessed, together with the rate of tax prescribed, to which shall be appended an affidavit in blank setting forth that the foregoing presents a full and true statement of all such personal property, taxable capital, or other basis of assessment, or either, as the case may be.

There would merely be the added requirement there on the part of the owner of moneys and credits that he should add to the list the moneys and credits which he owns, and he would have to make an affidavit to it, just as the owner of tangible personal property would have to do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is to say, the Senator from South Dakota is of the opinion that the only requirement would be to group the taxpayers' assets under different titles?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. For instance, the amount of municipal bonds held, the amount of railroad bonds held, and the amount of other classes of investments, without disclosing the individual investments?

Mr. STERLING. I think so.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption, I desire to say that where such a law as this which is now proposed has been in effect, I think the practice has always been—I know it has been in my State—to prepare a separate statement for the taxpayer to make out. One statement relates to his personal property, as we use that term, while the other relates entirely to the different forms of intangible property.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is just the point I had in mind. That is the law in most of the States, and I know it is the law of the State which I in part represent here.

Mr. CLAPP. Before we had the new law in our State, everything was embodied in one statement, which was signed by the taxpayer. Now there are two statements, which are distinct and separate papers, one to be signed, covering the ordinary personal property—furniture, horses, and such things—and the other the credits in the bank, money on hand, notes, bills, mortgages, and so forth.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think that is generally true; but the phraseology of the proposed amendment which troubles me is that these intangibles "shall be scheduled and appraised in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of said section 6 for listing and appraisal of tangible personal property."

Mr. STERLING. Exactly. So far that simply means the filling up of blanks with the statement of this particular class of property and its value. Now, if the Senator from Vermont will bear with me, I will call his attention to another part of the same paragraph which is applicable to tangible property. As to how far or to what extent it will be applicable to intangible property may be a matter of surmise. The language to which I refer reads:

Provided further, That if the said board of personal-tax appraisers be not satisfied as to the correctness of the return of personal property made by any person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee, said board may reject said return, and said board, or any one of the members thereof, may, from the best information he or they can procure, or by making such an examination of the personal property as may be practicable, assess the same in such amount as may to him or them seem just.

Of course a provision like that is almost necessary in any law relating to the assessment of property for taxation purposes, and especially as to personal property.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Particularly in a jurisdiction that has a system of individual returns. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to what seemed to me to be the requirement that all this class of property would be appraised as tangible personal property is appraised, and that, I think, would be impossible under any system that is known in any of the States. That only illustrates the misfortune of proposing to change in existing law by such an amendment instead of by a bill, in which event this subject could be considered in the committee room and all these questions be thrashed out.

I am in sympathy with the purpose of the amendment; I am in sympathy with the object which the Senator has in view, but I fear that in the adoption of the amendment we may perhaps fail to have it so well and so clearly constructed that in the administration of the law an injustice may not result either to the Government or to the taxpayer.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I first thought of providing in the amendment for some system of appraisal of this kind of property, and yet when I looked over the system provided in the law for the assessment and appraisal of personal property generally I thought it was easy to adapt the provisions of that part of the law to this amendment if it should prevail; that there was no need of providing any other system whatever. I think those provisions are eminently reasonable and just.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. When this proposed law comes to be worked out, it will undoubtedly require more legislation. In the sense of an estimate of the value of intangible personal property, there is no such thing as an appraisal. If a man has a thousand dollars in the bank, it is a thousand dollars; if he has a note for $10,000 in his vault, it is $10,000. Because it is taken at its full value, as my colleague [Mr. NELSON] so plainly stated a few moments ago, is the reason the rate of taxation is put so low on this kind of property.

Where such a law is in operation—I am speaking now from experience in my own State—a man simply returns the amount of money he has on deposit, the amount of notes he has, the amount of mortgages he has, and they are taxed at the very low rate of 3 mills on the dollar, while other property, which is subject to somebody else's opinion as to its value, is taxed at a very much higher rate—I think at about a cent and a half on the dollar.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STERLING. I yield the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] seems to have in mind, but I want to suggest to him that this is one of the most delicate subjects that can be taken up in a legislative way. He is basing his amendment on the theory that it is just. It may be or it may not be just. I think all classes of property should pay their due proportion in maintaining the Government; but there are so many different tax laws and so many different theories applying to taxes on real estate and on personal property that it seems to me that, when we take such a step as is now proposed in the District of Columbia, it should be taken after a suitable committee or commission has made a careful investigation of the amount of money or the probable amount of money that is going to be raised in this way, how it is going to affect the taxes on real estate, or in what other ways it is going to affect the body politic.

In the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, for example, we do not tax real estate mortgages on property held in Massachusetts, because that would be double taxation. It is the theory that the owner of the real estate pays the tax up to substantially its full value, and therefore the holder of the mortgage ought not to pay another tax. That, however, is not the rule followed in other States. In Massachusetts we tax personal property, such as stocks and bonds, at exactly the same rate which is imposed on real estate. That is not the rule followed in other States.

I have very decided doubts about the propriety of taxing one class of property at a different rate from the taxes imposed on another class. I should want to have pretty positive evidence that that was a just method of procedure. This whole thing is so complicated that it does not seem to me that it ought to be submitted as an amendment to an appropriation bill. I should be glad to vote for a proposition putting the matter into the hands of somebody to investigate carefully and to obtain from this class of property the just share of taxation which it should pay as the result of such an investigation.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Was not that the suggestion which was made two years ago when this matter came up? Gentlemen who opposed the proposition then wanted it referred to a committee to investigate. The committee investigated it; nothing has ever been done about it, and bonds and stocks and notes still go untaxed.

Mr. WEEKS. Quite likely the Senator is right; but I think he will absolve me from any such disposition.

Mr. JAMES. I was not personal at all.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that this class of property should be taxed; I think it is wrong that we should have a place where citizens can go and avoid the just taxation which they should have imposed against their property; but I do not think legislation of this character should be enacted in a haphazard way, and, notwithstanding what the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] says, it has seemed to me that the proper way to proceed is to have a suitable investigation and a report to Congress at the beginning of the session next December.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if the proposition for a tax on intangible property did not go out last year on a point of order?

Mr. JAMES. My recollection is that last year when this matter was up—or, perhaps, it was the year before—such a proposition was offered as an amendment to the District appropriation bill. The Senator may be right that a point of order at last was made against it.

Mr. GALLINGER. And was sustained.

Mr. JAMES. And later on the amendment went out; but it was urged then, as I have stated, by those who were opposed to taxing intangible property that the subject ought to be investigated, that the whole matter ought to be taken in hand and a very searching and far-reaching investigation made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, whether or not this amendment is adopted, I propose to offer at the proper time another amendment in these words:

That the Committee on the District of Columbia is hereby directed to make a careful and exhaustive study of the tax laws of the District of Columbia, including license taxes, with a view to recommending such changes as the committee may deem fair and equitable, a report to be made to the Senate during the next session of Congress.

I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the present license taxes are not fair taxes, and I think the committee probably would come to that conclusion.

I want further to say to the Senator from Minnesota that it is a little unfair in saying that I have committed myself absolutely against this amendment. I called attention to the fact that we do not tax intangible property in New Hampshire, but that would not deter me from voting for the amendment which has been proposed, if, after consideration, I should conclude that it is proper and right. At the present time I am not quite sure what my vote will be; but, inasmuch as New Hampshire has considered this matter many times and has not thought proper to impose a tax of this kind, I feel that I will be quite justified in voting against the amendment until my own State does take action.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, one rate of taxation on one class of property and a different rate on another class does not appeal to me in cases where the question of value can be ascertained. Intangible property is just as much subject to the demand of the State to pay its due share of the burden of government as the tangible wealth of the country.

I heartily agree with everything that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has said in regard to the haphazard way in which we are proceeding to enact the legislation under discussion. Notwithstanding the comments of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the Committee on the District of Columbia to evade action on the immediate question. That committee has been pretty busy for some time, and I think will do its duty. I merely take the floor now in explanation of the vote that I shall hereafter cast.

I am thoroughly in accord with the proposition to tax intangible property; but to tax intangible property at this late hour, through the medium of an amendment offered on the floor of the Senate, when no Senator knows the amount of property that will be affected, when no Senator knows what effect such a tax will have and should have on the real estate taxes in this District, it seems to me, to say the least, injudicious, and until an investigation is made, such as the Senator from New Hampshire has given notice that he will propose by an amendment, I shall certainly vote against the amendment proposed on the floor at this time, which may disjoint the symmetry of the present taxation system of the District of Columbia.

What effect the adoption of the amendment would have on the collection of taxes in the District no man can tell. The committee ought to take under investigation the very things which the Senator from New Hampshire includes in his proposed amendment; and until that time it seems to me it would be legislating without due consideration to put on the pending bill the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota calling for an arbitrary tax on certain property, when there is no information how much property is to be affected, how much money is to be obtained, what the effect will be on the property itself, or how much it will serve to relieve the people of whom the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] spoke with such feeling, and with whose remarks I am in thorough accord.

So, Mr. President, under the circumstances, it seems to me that it would be unsafe for us at this hour to place an amendment, the effect of which we know so little, on the pending appropriation bill. I shall stand by the committee, if the committee opposes the amendment, and, if it does not, I shall myself oppose the amendment for the reasons stated.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, two years ago, when this question was up for consideration, the Committee on the District of Columbia was notified that there was a considerable desire in the Senate to tax intangible property. The same suggestion as to an investigation, as I have heretofore pointed out, was indulged in then. It is rather a peculiar thing to me that when you come to tax the home of the poor man, when you come to tax the occupation of the small business man, there is no necessity, Mr. President, for delay; no reason is urged then that a committee must be appointed, and with great patience and research and thoroughness make an investigation before there is any attempt to lay a tax upon him. The Senate then, in its deliberative capacity, is perfectly competent to fix the tax that must rest upon him; but when the capitalist's holdings are to be taxed, when the gold and the bonds are to be reached, delay must be had and an investigation must be made. The Senate is just as competent now and just as well qualified now and just as well informed now to act upon the question of taxing intangible property as it was when it originally taxed the small holdings of the plain folk in the District of Columbia.

Many months ago the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] called the attention of the Senate to the vast list of rich people who have come to Washington from the various States in the Union and have sought it as a haven that would exempt them from taxation, but nothing was done. I introduced an amendment to tax intangible property, and it was ruled out of order at that time. If the Senate does not want to place a tax upon intangible property, if it wants the vast holdings of these very rich people to escape taxation, if it wants the holders of such property to enjoy the blessings of this great Government and pay nothing to support it, say so, and say so boldly. Let us not compromise by putting it off for investigation. When the investigation is had the Senate at last will have to be the final arbiter of the amount of taxation to be paid upon such property.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator says that the Senate is just as competent to pass upon this question now as it would be after an investigation. Is the Senator satisfied that taxing personal property 4 mills and taxing real estate a dollar and a half is a just system of taxation?

Mr. JAMES. It is more just than to tax real estate a dollar and a half and intangible property nothing.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, in my State intangible property is taxed at the same rate as real estate. If that is a just system of taxation, does not the Senator think it is better to take that than to adopt this piecemeal method?

Mr. JAMES. I am perfectly willing for the Senator to introduce an amendment attempting to put in force here in the District the tax system of Massachusetts, if he desires to do so, and let the Senate consider it; but, in reply to what the Senator says, there is this answer: While we may not put such a tax on intangible property as we ought to put on it, we will at least approach more nearly to justice by putting something on it, rather than to let it escape altogether.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, all Senators are in favor of imposing a tax upon intangible values in the District of Columbia. I think most of the States tax such property, and the information which has come to me is that a low rate on such property brings a larger return than a high one.

I can not understand how there is any possibility of injuring anybody by imposing the low tax rate of four-tenths of 1 per cent. If it is agreed that the holders of intangible property shall pay something, no one will contend that four-tenths of 1 per cent is too much. Therefore it is simply a question of whether Congress will, at this time, provide for taxing all personal property at a reasonable rate or leave intangible property as it is now, exempt from taxation.

I realize, of course, that the question of taxation is a very large one and very complicated; but I repeat that the proposition of the Senator from South Dakota does not do an injustice to anyone. If unjust at all, it is so to those who pay taxes on other kinds of property in the District, because the proposed rate is not high enough. If action on this matter were deferred for examination and investigation, it is probable that a tax on this now exempt property would be recommended, and certainly no lower rate than that proposed by the Senator from South Dakota would be imposed.

If we start with four-tenths of 1 per cent, it stands to reason that the whole question of taxation in the District will be studied and a readjustment had which will remedy the present evils, which have been so clearly and forcibly presented by the Senators from New Hampshire and Minnesota. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that unless we start this needed reform we are going to postpone indefinitely a question which all admit imperatively needs consideration. I confess frankly that I want to reach those tax dodgers who find the District tax laws favorable to their purposes, and I am going to take advantage of the present opportunity to begin this reform. Therefore it becomes my plain duty to support an amendment which does no injustice to any taxpayer, but recognizes a principle which should have been recognized long ago by the Congress. It is intimated that this additional tax will produce more money than the District needs. Maybe it will for this year, but the fact nevertheless exists that some wealth is now escaping taxation. It should contribute to the support of the government, and if more money is raised than the District appropriations require, the surplus, as has been done in the past, will be turned in to the Federal Treasury, and hereafter the general tax rate in the District can be lowered by reason of the addition of much personal property to its assessable values.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I simply want to express my hearty concurrence in what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. It strikes me as rather singular that whenever a question of this character comes up in the Senate for consideration—a question involving certain property interests, especially when the interests of that class of our people who are best able to bear the burden of taxation—the matter assumes at once a very abstruse and difficult form, and in order that eternal justice shall be done it becomes necessary to have the whole matter passed upon by a commission composed of men possessing expert knowledge. There seems to be a growing disposition on the part of certain Members of this body that the Congress is incapable of dealing with any question affecting the profits of the rich folk without first referring the question to a commission. Senators discuss this question with a Delphic air, as though it were shrouded in inscrutable mystery. Now, I do not think this a very healthy sign. Personally I am opposed to legislation by commission. I believe the further we get away from the people the more inclined the officer is to neglect the public interests. Congress was created by the Constitution charged with the duty and power of making laws—levying taxes and otherwise legislating for the public good. And I am in favor of Congress performing that function and not delegating it to any other power.

If not the purpose, the effect of this reference will be to defeat taxation on this particular form of property—a form of property which is best able to bear the burden of government, whose strong arm it always promptly invokes for its protection. You may lay the hand of taxation upon the widow, you can tax the orphan to pauperization, you can pile up mountain high on the aching stoop of the laboring man every form of taxation, and nobody raises a question or seems disturbed about it. Congress is amply able, offhand, without special deliberation to levy a tax upon the toilers and wealth producers of this Republic, but when you propose to tax money, levy tribute upon invisible wealth, which is possessed by that class of our population who get more out of the Government and do less for it than anybody else, then Senators insist upon taking it under consideration to give Congress an opportunity to pray over it lest some injustice be done to the innocent, helpless, patriotic rich. I sincerely hope that the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] may be agreed to; and if it is not altogether perfect in every detail, if there is the slightest injustice that may result from it, there is no doubt about Congress correcting the mistake at once. It is a movement in the right direction, and I want to see the movement begun.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. VARDAMAN. Just a moment. This tax of four-tenths of 1 per cent will be levied upon the property described in the amendment. The property described in the amendment ought to be taxed, and four-tenths of 1 per cent is not an excessive tax, and so where the injustice is liable to get in I can not understand; but I do understand that if the property which this amendment proposes to tax shall continue to be exempt from taxation a great wrong will be done every other man and woman who are taxed for the support of the Government. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Mississippi, in the observation that when efforts of this kind are made the suggestion follows that we should postpone them, does not apply to my suggestion that I would offer a provision later on that the District of Columbia Committee should look into this matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I had no reference whatever to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not in any way affect the pending amendment. My only thought was that if this tax was to be imposed, as I presume it will be imposed, certain other taxes are unfair, and that the people ought to be relieved from them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no objection in the least to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. I think it is prudent; I think it is timely to get information on that subject or any other subject about which Congress must legislate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But I do not think it is fair to postpone action on this amendment, which would permit those owning intangible property to enjoy exemption until the commission, which the Senator proposes to create, or, rather, the information which he desires to obtain shall be forthcoming.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had no such purpose in view. My idea was that when the pending amendment had been acted upon, then I would offer the amendment of which I have given notice at some other time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no idea that the Senator from New Hampshire is going to do anything that is not patriotic and proper. I would not impute to him any other than the loftiest motives. His distinguished service in this body compels that exalted opinion.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think there is another reason why this amendment should be adopted. I think there can be no question but that a great many of the wealthy people of the country have nominal homes in the city of Washington because they find here a snug harbor, a place where they can enjoy exemption from that burden of taxation which ought to be common to all. There should be no spot in the United States in which a man can take refuge in order to secure immunity from the obligations of citizenship; and if the Capital of the Nation furnishes such a snug harbor, we should as soon as possible enact legislation for the purpose of making it no longer that sort of a place.

I live in a part of the town between which and the Capitol lies what may be called the better, or a part of the better, residential district of the city of Washington; and in my walks to and fro I have noticed the empty houses, the empty palaces stretching along our boulevards and residential thoroughfares, magnificent structures, the doors and windows boarded up, and which are unoccupied for the greater part of every year. They are the homes of people who call themselves residents of the District, and who maintain that residence by temporary habitation of their houses in the District. I have no doubt that a great many of these people—I will not say all of them, but I think a majority of them—have located themselves here for no purpose on earth except to escape that burden of taxation from which, as I say, no man who has property in this country should be free.

Of course, the tendency of capital is to avoid taxation and to pass it on. Our present income-tax prohibits the assumption by those who issue securities of the income-tax; and the effort is now being made—I do not think it will be successful, although it was in the House—to remove that provision from the income-tax law, so that the bondholder may shift his income-tax from his own to the shoulders of the consumers of the country. It is our duty, without waiting for the reports of commissions, to prevent these practices and these legal enactments under and by means of which a large portion of property which is the just subject of taxation escapes these burdens.

I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I was delighted a moment ago to hear the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] urge the adoption of this amendment on this appropriation bill. I was pleased to hear him suggest that the Senate was just as competent now to pass upon this proposition as it would be after investigation. I am glad to hear him say that because of an amendment that I now intend to propose, which has been heretofore kept off the appropriation bills, or which it has been heretofore urged should be kept off, because it is general legislation and because we ought to have these things acted upon separately and by a committee, and so forth. I was also glad to see that the Senator from Kentucky voted to sustain the decision of the Chair holding this amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota to be in order.

Before I propose the amendment that I intend to offer to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota I desire to call attention to the character of the amendment offered and the decision of the Senate with reference to it.

When the Senator from South Dakota presented this amendment he conceded that it was subject to a point of order. He conceded that it was legislation on an appropriation bill. But, notwithstanding that concession—

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator is in error in saying that I conceded that it was subject to a point of order. I questioned whether it might not be subject to a point of order. I did not quite concede that it was subject to a point of order. I suggested that it might be, but I did not concede that it was.

Mr. JONES. The Senator did not insist that it was not.

Mr. STERLING. I did not insist that it was not, I agree; but I should like to have the Senator quote me correctly.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the Record will speak for itself. I am only speaking from recollection and from the impression I got. I did have the impression that the Senator conceded that it was subject to a point of order.

Mr. BORAH. As the Senator knows, mental reservations these days are very happy.

Mr. JONES. Yes; mental reservations are very happy, and it is apparently very easy for the Senate to change its mind overnight.

This amendment is proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I voted to sustain the Chair in his ruling solely on the theory that this is not a general appropriation bill. There may not be very many in the Senate who will agree with that; but that is the only theory, to my mind, upon which the ruling of the Vice President and the decision of the Senate upon that ruling can be sustained.

What is this amendment? Why, it starts out by the declaration—that is, this is in the printed form—

Section 6 of the act of July 1, 1902, "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding, after paragraph 2 of said section,

It does not purport to amend any provision in the District of Columbia appropriation bill. There is not a paragraph in the District of Columbia bill that this amendment purports to amend; but it does purport to amend a paragraph of section 6 of a prior law, which provides a system of taxation for the District of Columbia.

In other words, it is legislation, and it is general legislation, if legislation relating to the District of Columbia is ever general legislation; and it is legislation offered to a general appropriation bill, if the District of Columbia appropriation bill is a general appropriation bill. So it not only changes existing law, but it is of a general character and is general legislation, if there is anything in our rules that applies to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. But, as I remember it, upon the theory that it affects taxation, a system of revenues, and so forth, for the District of Columbia, it was held to be in order, and the Senate sustained that ruling.

Now, then, I am going to offer an amendment to this amendment which is in order, which also affects the revenues of the District of Columbia; and if this amendment is in order, then my amendment must certainly be in order. But first, before I offer it, I want to call attention to the act that this amendment proposes to amend. I have it here.

It seems that this was a part of the District of Columbia appropriation bill of 1902, and that apparently we provided in that appropriation bill by general legislation, if there is such a thing as general legislation for the District of Columbia, a general system of taxation, licenses, and all that sort of thing. I find that section 5 of this act relates to the taxation of real estate, and here we have a system of taxation of real estate. Then section 6 of the act is entitled "Taxation of personal property." Now, section 6 goes on to say—

That in order to provide revenues to meet the appropriations made by this act and appropriations to be hereafter made to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, it is further enacted—

And so forth.

Then here is a section containing a large number of paragraphs with reference to personal-property taxes, tax upon hotel companies, tax upon banks as trustees for their stockholders and companies that guarantee the fidelity of any individual, the capital stock of corporations and building associations, and personal property that shall be exempt from taxation. Then it provides that the assessors shall go through certain proceedings, and then that general brokers shall pay a tax of $250 per annum, and that note brokers shall pay a tax of $150, and so forth. Now, it is paragraph 2 that the Senator proposes to amend.

Paragraph 2 puts a tax on all tangible personal property, assessed at its fair cash value. The Senator from South Dakota proposes to put a tax on certain property that is not included in this general scheme of taxation. In other words, he is legislating, just as we legislated there. He is increasing the property that is subject to taxation, and fixing the rate that it shall hereafter bear.

Section 7 of this same general appropriation bill is entitled "License taxes." It provides for a tax upon trades, professions, callings, businesses, and so forth, and prohibits the operation of certain devices, and provides that druggists shall pay a certain tax, and then provides a liquor tax, and all that sort of thing, all relating to the revenues of the District. Now, Mr. President, as relating to the revenues of the District—as relating to the system of taxation which the Senate holds in order by holding in order the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota—I offer, as an additional paragraph of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the following:

And that on and after the 1st day of November, A. D. 1916, no person or persons, or any house, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, directly or indirectly, in the District of Columbia shall manufacture, sell, offer for sale, keep for sale, traffic in, barter, or exchange for goods or merchandise, or solicit or receive orders for the purchase of any alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for beverage purposes or for any other purposes than scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, mechanical, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes.

Wherever the term "alcoholic liquors" is used in this paragraph it shall be deemed to include whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, ale, porter, beer, cordials, hard or fermented cider, alcoholic bitters, ethyl alcohol, all malt liquors, and all other alcoholic liquors.

That any person or persons, or any house, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, who shall directly or indirectly violate the provisions of this paragraph shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 nor more than $1,000, and shall be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for a period of not less than 30 days nor more than one year for each offense.

That the provisions of this paragraph shall not be construed to prevent the manufacture, importation, or sale of denatured or of methyl alcohol or of ethyl alcohol for scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, or mechanical purposes nor to prevent the sale of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors by druggists for medicinal purposes on prescriptions of physicians under the regulations set out in this paragraph: Provided, That the manufacture and sale of ethyl alcohol or of alcoholic liquors for sacramental purposes shall be restricted to manufacturers and druggists licensed, respectively, to make and sell such alcohol and alcoholic or other prohibited liquors, as hereinafter provided, for scientific, mechanical, pharmaceutical, medicinal, or sacramental purposes only.

That regularly licensed and registered druggists or pharmacists in the District of Columbia shall not sell alcoholic or other prohibited liquors nor compound, nor mix any composition thereof, nor sell any malt extract or other proprietary medicines containing alcohol, except such compounds, compositions, malt extracts, or proprietary medicines be so medicated as to be medicinal preparations or compounds unfit for use as beverages, except upon a written and bona fide prescription of a duly licensed and regularly practicing physician in the District of Columbia, whose name shall be signed thereto. Such prescription shall contain a statement that the disease of the patient requires such a prescription, shall be numbered in the order of receiving, and shall be canceled by writing on it the word "canceled" and the date on which it was presented and filled, and kept on file in consecutive order, subject to public inspection at all times during business hours. No such prescription shall be filled more than once. Every druggist or pharmacist selling intoxicating liquors as herein provided shall keep a book provided for the purpose, and shall enter therein at the time of every sale a true record of the date of the sale, the name of the purchaser, who shall sign his name in said book as a part of the entry, his residence (giving the street and house number, if there be such), the kind and quantity and price of such liquor, the purpose for which it was sold, and the name of the physician giving the prescription therefor. Such book shall be open to public inspection during business hours, and shall be in form substantially as follows:

Date.	Name of purchaser.	Residence.	Kind and quantity.	Purpose of use.	Price.	Name of physician.	Signature of purchaser.

Said book shall be produced before the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or the courts when required, and shall also contain a statement of the kind and amount of alcoholic and other prohibited liquors on hand when this paragraph shall go into effect, and thereafter such druggist or pharmacist shall, on the order of the court or the Commissioners of the District, make a statement of the amount of intoxicating liquor sold or used in any manner since the last statement and the amount on hand at the date when such court or commissioners require such statement: Provided, That ethyl alcohol may be sold without a physician's prescription for mechanical, medicinal, pharmaceutical, scientific, or other nonbeverage purposes by registered and licensed druggists or pharmacists, or by licensed manufacturers, each and all of whom shall keep a book for the purpose of registering such sales in a similar manner and form as required for the sale of other alcoholic and other prohibited liquors by the provisions of this section: Provided further, That any person who shall make any false statement as to the purpose or use of alcohol purchased under the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined for each offense not less than $50 nor more than $200, and in default of the payment of such fine shall be imprisoned in the jail or workhouse of said District not less than 30 days nor more than six months.

Any druggist or pharmacist who shall sell or dispense any alcoholic or other prohibited liquors, except in such manner as provided in this paragraph, or who shall fail or refuse to keep the record herein required, or who shall refill any prescription, or who shall violate any other provisions of this paragraph, shall be guilty of illegal selling, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in this paragraph. Upon a second conviction for said offense, in addition to the penalties prescribed in said section 1, it shall be a part of the judgment of conviction that the license of such druggist or pharmacist to practice pharmacy shall be revoked, and the court before which such person is tried and convicted shall cause a certified copy of such judgment of conviction to be certified to the board having authority to issue license to practice pharmacy in the District of Columbia.

Any physician who shall prescribe any alcoholic or other prohibited liquor except for treatment of disease, which, after his own personal diagnosis, he shall deem to require such treatment, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, and in default of payment of said fine shall be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for not less than 30 nor more than 90 days, and upon a second conviction for said offense, in addition to the penalty above provided, it shall be a part of the judgment of conviction that the license of such physician to practice medicine be revoked, and the court before which such physician is tried and convicted shall cause a certified copy of such judgment of conviction to be certified to the board having authority to issue licenses to practice medicine in the District of Columbia.

That when any minister, pastor, or priest of a religious congregation or church desires wine for sacramental purposes in the usual religious exercises of his denomination, he may apply to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for a permit, stating the amount desired, for what period, and for what purpose, and said commissioners, if satisfied of the good faith of the application, shall grant a written permit to the applicant permitting the shipment to him, or the purchase by him, of such amount as is shown to be reasonably necessary, which amount shall be stated in the permit, together with the purpose for which it is to be used and the period to be covered by such use; the amount of wine permitted to be shipped or purchased under one permit shall not exceed 5 gallons, and the said permit shall be attached to the outside of the package by the shipper and remain so attached until delivered to the consignee, when it shall be canceled by the carrier. Said permit shall be void after 20 days, and shall not be used for more than one shipment.

That any person, company, or corporation desiring to manufacture alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for the purposes permitted this paragraph shall, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, obtain a license from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the year beginning November 1 upon the payment of $100, which money shall be deposited with other license funds of the District. Druggists, wholesale or retail, desiring to sell alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for the purposes permitted in this paragraph shall obtain a license in the same way for the same period, the fee for wholesale druggists being $25, for retail druggists $10. The commissioners shall have power to refuse or revoke all licenses referred to in this section if doubtful of the good faith of the licensee and his intention to comply with this paragraph. Manufacturers licensed according to this section shall sell alcoholic and other prohibited liquors to druggists only, and only to such druggists as are licensed under the terms of this paragraph: Provided, That hospitals, departments of the Government, colleges, and laboratories may purchase alcoholic liquors from manufacturers, after obtaining permit from the District Commissioners, who shall be satisfied of the good faith of said purchasers before granting permit, and who shall require records and reports of all sales made by such manufacturers. No others than druggists and manufacturers licensed according to this section may manufacture or sell alcoholic and other prohibited liquors in this District of Columbia, and these only for the purposes permitted by this paragraph. Violations of this paragraph shall be punished by a fine of not less than $300 nor more than $1,000 and by imprisonment in the District jail or workhouse for not less than 30 days nor more than 1 year.

That it shall be unlawful for any common or other carrier, express company, or any person to deliver to any person, company, corporation, club, association, or order, his or its agents, clerks, or employees, any liquors for prohibited purposes in the District of Columbia, knowing same to be such, and in the case of shipments of liquors for purposes not prohibited it shall be unlawful to bring the same into the District of Columbia, or to deliver the same therein, in original packages or otherwise, on any Sunday or on any other day before 6 o'clock a. m. and after 5 o'clock p. m. Any common or other carrier, express company, or any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, or be confined in the District jail or workhouse not less than one nor more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

That every person who shall directly or indirectly keep or maintain by himself or by associating with others, or who shall in any manner aid, assist, or abet in keeping or maintaining any clubhouse or other place in which any alcoholic liquor is received or kept for the purpose of barter or sale or for distribution or division among the members of any club or association by any means whatsoever, or who shall maintain what is commonly known as the "locker system" or other device for evading the provisions of this paragraph, and every person who shall use, barter, sell, or assist or abet in bartering or selling any liquors so received or kept, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof be subject to the penalties prescribed in this paragraph; and in all cases the members, shareholders, associates, or employees in any club or association mentioned in this section shall be competent witnesses to prove any violations of the provisions of this paragraph or of any fact tending thereto; and no person shall be excused from testifying as to any offense committed by another against any of the provisions of this act by reason of his testimony tending to criminate himself, but the testimony given by such person shall in no case be used against him.

That the keeping or giving away of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for the purpose of evading the provisions of this paragraph shall be deemed an unlawful selling, subject to the penalties provided in this paragraph.

That if any person shall advertise or give notice of, by signs, billboards, newspapers, periodicals, or otherwise, for himself or another, the manufacturer, offering for sale or keeping for sale of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for purposes forbidden under this paragraph, or shall circulate or distribute any price list, circulars, or order blanks advertising such liquors, or publish or distribute any newspaper, magazine, periodical, or other written or printed paper in which such advertisements of liquors appear, or shall permit to be posted upon his premises or premises under his control (including billboards), or shall permit the same to so remain upon such premises, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500.

That if one or more persons who are competent witnesses shall charge, on oath or affirmation, before the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, presenting that any person, company, copartnership, association, club, or corporation has or have violated or is violating the provisions of this paragraph by manufacturing or offering for sale, keeping for sale, trafficking in, bartering, exchanging for goods, or otherwise furnishing alcoholic liquor, shall request said corporation counsel or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him to issue a warrant, said attorney or any of his assistants shall issue such warrant, in which warrant the room, house, building, or other place in which the violation is alleged to have occurred or is occurring shall be specifically described, and said warrant shall be placed in the hands of the captain or acting captain of the police precinct in which the room, house, building, or other place above referred to is located, commanding him to at once thoroughly search said described room, house, building, or other place, and the appurtenances thereof, and if any such be found to take into his possession and safely keep, to be produced as evidence when required, all alcoholic liquors and all the means of dispensing the same, also all the paraphernalia or part of the paraphernalia of a barroom or other alcoholic liquor establishment, and any United States internal-revenue tax receipt or certificate for the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquor effective for the period of time covering the alleged offense, and forthwith report all the facts to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and such alcoholic liquor or the means for dispensing same, or the paraphernalia of a barroom or other alcoholic liquor establishment, or any United States internal-revenue tax receipt or certificate for the sale of alcoholic liquor effective as aforesaid, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of the provisions of this paragraph.

That any person who shall, in the District of Columbia, in any street, or public or private road, alley, or in any public place or building or in or upon any street car, or any other vehicle commonly used for the transportation of passengers, or in or about any depot, platform, or waiting station, drink any alcoholic liquor of any kind, or if any person shall be drunk or intoxicated in any street, alley, or public or private road or in any railroad passenger train, street car, or any public place or building, or at any public gathering, or if any person shall be drunk or intoxicated and shall disturb the peace of any person anywhere, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment for not less than 5 days nor more than 30 days in the workhouse or jail of the District of Columbia, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

That the payment of the special tax required of wholesale or retail liquor dealers by the United States by any person or persons other than manufacturers or druggists licensed under section 5 of this act, within the District of Columbia, shall be prima facie evidence that such person or persons are engaged in keeping and selling, offering and exposing for sale alcoholic liquors contrary to the provisions of this paragraph, and a certificate from the collector of internal revenue, his agents, clerks, or deputies, showing the payment of such tax, and the name or names of persons to whom issued, and the names of the person or persons, if any, associated with the person to whom such tax receipt is issued, shall be sufficient evidence of the payment of such tax and of the association of such persons for the selling and keeping, offering and exposing for sale of liquors contrary to the provisions of this paragraph in all trials or legal inquiries.

That all houses, boathouses, buildings, club rooms, and places of every description, including drug stores, where alcoholic liquors are manufactured, sold, vended, or furnished contrary to law (including those in which clubs, orders, or associations sell, barter, distribute, or dispense intoxicating liquors to their members, by any means or device whatever, as provided in this paragraph) shall be held, taken, and deemed common and public nuisances. And any person who shall maintain, or shall aid or abet, or knowingly be associated with others in maintaining such common and public nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in this paragraph, and judgment shall be given that such house, building, or other place, or any room therein, be abated or closed up as a place for the sale or keeping such liquor contrary to law, as the court may determine.

That the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, or any citizen of the District of Columbia, may maintain an action in equity in the name of the United States to abate and perpetually enjoin such a nuisance as defined in the preceding section. The injunction shall be granted at the commencement of the action, and no bond shall be required. Any person violating the terms of any injunction granted in such proceedings shall be punished for contempt by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and by imprisonment in the District jail or workhouse for not less than 30 days nor more than 6 months, in the discretion of the court.

That when any violation of this paragraph is threatened, or shall have occurred, or is occurring, the doing of, or the continuance or repetition of the unlawful act, or any of like kind by the offending party may be prevented by a writ of injunction out of a court of equity upon a bill filed in all respects as in cases of liquor nuisances; in like manner the writ of injunction may be employed to compel obedience to any provision of this paragraph.

That if a tenant of a building or tenement uses such premises, or any part thereof, in maintaining a common nuisance as hereinbefore defined, or knowingly permits such use by another, such use shall render void the lease under which he holds, and shall cause the right of possession to revert to the owner or lessor, who may, without process of law, make immediate entry upon the premises, or may avail himself of the remedy provided for the forcible detention thereof.

That anyone who knowingly permits any building owned or leased by him or under his control, or any part thereof, to be used in maintaining a common nuisance hereinbefore described in this paragraph, after being notified in writing of such use, neglects to take all reasonable measures to eject therefrom the person so using the same shall be deemed guilty of assisting in maintaining such nuisance.

That no property rights of any kind shall exist in alcoholic liquors or beverages, illegally manufactured, received, possessed, or stored under this paragraph, and in all such cases the liquors are forfeited to the District of Columbia and may be searched for and seized and ordered to be destroyed by the court after a conviction when such liquors have been seized for use as evidence, or upon satisfactory evidence to the court presented by the corporation counsel that such liquors are contraband.

That every wife, child, parent, guardian, or employer, or other person who shall be injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, such wife, child, parent, or guardian shall have a right of action, in his or her own name, against any person who shall, by selling or bartering intoxicating liquors, have caused the intoxication of such person, for all damages actually sustained, as well as for exemplary damages; and a married woman shall have the right to bring suit, prosecute, and control the same, and the amount recovered the same as if unmarried; and all damages recovered by a minor under this paragraph shall be paid either to such minor or to his or her parents, guardian, or next friend, as the court shall direct.

That if any person while in charge of a locomotive engine, or while acting as a conductor or brakeman of a car or train of cars, or while in charge of any street car, steamboat, launch, or other water craft, or while in charge of or operating any automobile or horse vehicle in the District of Columbia, shall be intoxicated, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and if convicted shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $300, and in default in payment of said fine shall be imprisoned in the District Jail or Workhouse for not exceeding three months, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to enforce the provisions of this paragraph. They shall detail qualified members of the police force to detect violations of the paragraph, if any, and to report promptly all knowledge or information they may have concerning such violations, together with the names of any witnesses by whom they may be proven to the corporation counsel; but it shall be the duty of all members of the police force to detect violations of the paragraph and to promptly report any information or knowledge concerning the same to the corporation counsel, together with the names of witnesses by whom such violations may be proven; and the corporation counsel shall bring such alleged violators of the law to trial with all due diligence.

If any such officer shall fail to comply with the provisions of this paragraph he shall, upon conviction, be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $500; and such conviction shall be a forfeiture of the office held by such person, and the court before whom such conviction tion is had shall, in addition to imposition of the fine aforesaid, order and adjudge the forfeiture of his said office. For a failure or neglect of official duty in the enforcement of this paragraph any official herein referred to may be removed by court action.

That prosecutions for violations of the provisions of this paragraph shall be on information filed in the police court by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, and said corporation counsel or his assistants shall file such information upon the presentation to him or his assistants of sworn information that the law has been violated; and such corporation counsel and his assistants shall have power to administer oaths to such informant or informants, and such others as present themselves, and anyone making a false oath to any material fact shall be deemed guilty of perjury and subject to the same penalties as now provided by law for such offense.

When, however, it appears to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that it will be in the interest of more effective enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph, they may request the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia to prosecute persons charged with offenses against the law, and when so requested by said commissioners the said district attorney shall proceed before the grand jury and in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to prosecute such offenders in manner now prescribed by law for the prosecution of persons charged with violations of the laws against crime in the District of Columbia.

That if for any reason any provision or part of this paragraph shall be held unconstitutional or invalid, that fact shall not affect or destroy any other provision or part of the paragraph not in and of itself invalid, but the remaining parts of the paragraph shall be enforced without regard to that so invalidated.

That in the interpretation of this paragraph words of the singular number shall be deemed to include their plurals and words of the masculine gender shall be deemed to include the feminine, as the case may be.

That this paragraph shall be in full force and effect on and after the 1st day of November, 1916; and the Excise Board of the District of Columbia provided for and established under the act making appropriations to provide for the expense of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, be, and it is hereby, abolished upon the taking effect of this paragraph.

During the reading of the amendment,

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in order to save time I will simply say that this amendment was prepared by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. The bill to the same effect has been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and is now on the calendar. I want to say that it does not interfere at all with the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota. I am in favor of putting these taxes on intangible property. I voted to sustain the ruling of the Chair with reference to that; but this is simply an addition to it, and, of course, if it should be adopted, then the whole amendment would be adopted. Of course, if this should be voted down, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President—

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understand that a bill before our committee pertaining to this matter has been acted upon.

Mr. JONES. It has, and it is now on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Notwithstanding there is a bill to this effect which has been acted upon by the committee and is on the calendar, the Senator proposes to put this on an appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. I propose to put it on the amendment that the Senate has held in order. It has not been acted upon by any committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understand; but this is a new amendment, and is an amendment entirely in accord with a bill that has been acted upon by a committee of the Senate, and is on the calendar.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and therefore it has a much better standing before the Senate, according to some, than the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will state his point of order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My point of order is that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

The Chair understood the Vice President to base his former ruling upon the ground that the bill as it came to the Senate having changed the law heretofore in effect by abolishing the half-and-half system, it was pertinent to offer an amendment to the bill touching the collection of the revenues which were thus to be appropriated. The Chair does not believe that the amendment now offered can be regarded as in any sense a revenue measure. It absolutely prohibits the carrying on of a certain line of business in the District of Columbia. The present occupant of the chair feels that there is a very distinct line of demarcation between these two amendments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if I may interrupt just a moment, it is also an amendment in the second degree, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is a committee amendment, then an amendment to the committee amendment, and this is an amendment to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota is an amendment to the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; to the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am informed that I am in error about that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think the rulings of the last few days, both of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate, will furnish some very interesting reading and very interesting study to students of parliamentary law. They will see the very fine distinctions that have been made with reference to these various propositions, and also, during this session, the rulings under which amendments relating to this traffic have been excluded from various bills.

I am not going to embarrass the Senate by asking it to reverse the ruling of a few minutes ago, which I am satisfied it would do if I were to appeal from the decision of the Presiding Officer; and therefore I shall not appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	Neison	Smoot
Bankhead	James	Norris	Sterling
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Stone
Bryan	Jones	Page	Taggart
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Penrose	Thomas
Clapp	Kern	Ransdell	Thompson

Gronna	Lippitt	Smith, Ariz.	Wadsworth
Hardwick	Lodge	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Hollis	McLean	Smith, Md.	Weeks
Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING and Mr. VARDAMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLE] to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] who I am told is absent on official business. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I wish to make the same announcement as heretofore and I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement that I made on the former vote as to the transfer of my pair, I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. Through a misapprehension, thinking it was the Jones amendment, I voted "nay." With the information as to what the amendment was, having been out in the hall, I now want to vote "yea." I thought I was voting against the Jones amendment, which amendment I did wish to vote against.

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently a moment ago. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], but I understand if present he would vote as I do, and so I will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; and

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—51.

Ashurst	Johnson, Me.	Myers	Sterling
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Swanson
Borah	Jones	Norris	Taggart
Bryan	Kenyon	Overman	Thomas
Clapp	Kern	Page	Thompson
Cummins	La Follette	Pittman	Tillman
Dillingham	Lane	Polindexter	Townsend
Fletcher	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gronna	Lewis	Sherman	Wadsworth
Hollis	Lippitt	Shields	Walsh
Hughes	Lodge	Smith, Ga.	Weeks
Husting	McLean	Smith, S. C.	Works
James	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

NAYS—12.

Bankhead	Hardwick	Ransdell	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Martin, Va.	Saulsbury	Underwood
Gallinger	Penrose	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

NOT VOTING—32.

Brady	Culberson	Lea, Tenn.	Reed
Brandegge	Curtis	McCumber	Robinson
Broussard	du Pont	Newlands	Shafroth
Catron	Fall	O'Gorman	Simmons
Chilton	Goff	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Clark, Wyo.	Gore	Owen	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Harding	Phelan	Sutherland
Colt	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Warren

So Mr. STERLING's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I want to say in regard to the vote I have just cast that it is no evidence that I am opposed to the taxation of intangible property in the District of Columbia. We have a law in my State, and I think the tax is right, that intangible property shall be taxed; but my reason for voting against the amendment is that I do not believe legislation of this character should be carried upon an appropriation bill. Hence I voted "nay." If it had been a regular legislative bill, an independent measure, I should have voted "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will take occasion at this point to reserve the vote on the amendment in the Senate for the purpose of offering an amendment to it providing for a joint committee of Congress to investigate the tax laws of the District.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

NEWARK TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 193) authorizing the Postmaster General to provide the postmaster of Newark, N. J., with a special canceling die for the Newark two hundred and fiftieth anniversary celebration.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator that I must object to it if it is going to lead to any debate.

Mr. HUGHES. If it is going to cause any debate I will withdraw it. A similar joint resolution was unanimously reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and it passed the Senate. That joint resolution went to the House and the House passed its own resolution instead of the one passed by the Senate. I simply ask that the Senate do what it has already done and pass this joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senate joint resolution been recalled from the House?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senate joint resolution is now in the House. The Senate has passed its own resolution and the House passed its resolution instead of passing the Senate resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate joint resolution is not on the calendar?

Mr. HUGHES. Not at the present time. It has already passed the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Has this joint resolution been referred to the committee since it passed the House?

Mr. HUGHES. It is automatic. The same measure already passed the Senate, and it comes over here, having passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to know the history of it to know whether it should be treated as a committee report or whether the Senator is asking to have it passed just as it came from the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask to have it passed just as it came from the House.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator makes that request as a member of the committee?

Mr. HUGHES. No; I am not a member of the committee. The committee has already acted on it. The committee unanimously reported the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All I know about it is that the Postmaster General wrote a very strong letter in opposition to this proposition. He may have changed his mind, and I am not going to make any objection to it.

Mr. HUGHES. I will read the letter of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SMOOT. I will object to the joint resolution at this time. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERN. I desire to reserve for a separate vote in the Senate all the amendments providing appropriations for park purposes, namely, the committee amendment on page 111, from line 7 to line 24, the amendment adopted yesterday offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], which is the insertion, on page 111, after line 24, of an amendment providing an appropriation of $175,641.43, and also the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], on page 112, after line 5, in which $164,349 is appropriated for land and $16,000 for laying out, grading, improving, and extension of Jewett Street. I shall ask for a vote on these amendments separately in the Senate.

Mr. LANE. There is, on line 6, page 78, under the head of "Health Department," an amendment put in by the committee of the Senate which proposes to pay $1,400 for an assistant chief inspector in the health department. I am going to make a motion to strike that out, and I wish to raise a point of order against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Oregon permit a remark from the Chair? The Chair is advised that the amendment has already been adopted, and suggests to the Senator accordingly that he reserve that amendment for a separate vote when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. LANE. Very well; I will accept that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole which have not been reserved for a separate vote.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now arises on the amendments which have been reserved for a separate vote. They will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] reserves the amendment on page 112, after line 5.

Mr. KERN. I should like to say a word on the amendments I have had reserved.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I reserve the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota for the purpose of offering an amendment to it, which I now submit. I think there will be no objection on the part of any Senator to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] reserved the amendment on page 122, at the end of the bill offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. He now proposes to add at the end of the amendment heretofore agreed to the following proviso:

Provided, That a joint committee consisting of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate and the Committee of the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives is hereby appointed to make by subcommittee or otherwise, a careful and exhaustive study of the tax laws of the District of Columbia, including license taxes, with a view of recommending such changes in the laws as the joint committee may deem fair and equitable, report to be made to the Congress during the next session.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. KERN obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Chair recognized me some time ago and I yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not recognize the Senator from Utah. It was stated that the amendment reserved by the Senator from Utah is the first amendment to be voted upon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Do not the reserved amendments come up in the order in which they appear in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the way the Chair understands it, and that is the order the Chair will pursue unless otherwise directed by the Senate.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I shall address myself to the proposition to strike out all the amendments that were adopted as in Committee of the Whole providing for appropriations for the purchase of land for parks in the District of Columbia: First the committee amendment that is to be found on page 111, which appropriates $1,125,000 for the purchase of the Patterson tract and the purchase of the Dean tract; next the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] on page 111, which provides for an appropriation of one hundred and seventy-five thousand and odd dollars for the purchase of certain land mentioned in that amendment; and also the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], appropriating $180,000 for the purchase of certain land described in that amendment and for laying off, grading, and improving a certain street.

Mr. President, on yesterday the Senate was unexpectedly called upon to respond to an appeal from the people of six Southern States for relief on account of injuries suffered by them in the recent flood, and we properly and justly responded to that appeal by the appropriation of $540,000.

There have been extraordinary appropriations—that is, appropriations of extraordinary amount—already made at this session growing out of the extraordinary conditions which confront us, and it has occurred to me that in view of the large amount we were called upon to appropriate yesterday and the extraordinary amounts heretofore appropriated during this session, these appropriations for the purchase of land for park purposes, which may well wait until another session, ought to be stricken out of the bill. It is because of that feeling I have made the proposition to strike out these amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am gratified to note the fact that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has been finally aroused to the need of economy on the part of the majority. A prominent citizen from North Carolina called to see me this morning. He formerly resided in Pennsylvania. He informed me that a large part of this flood condition was due to the alleged improvements made by the Government on Broad River, for which, doubtless, thousands of dollars were appropriated in past years, and which resulted in the river filling up, nature being thus obstructed and thereby causing the flood. So, not only has the Government lost thousands of dollars by an ill-advised project of river improvement, but now we are called upon to take care of the inhabitants who are homeless on account of the flood due to the Government improvements.

This condition prevails in other parts of the country. The same allegation has been made regarding the Mississippi River where levees and embankments have been constructed by the Government and have thrown the water over to the other side and flooded the country affected, and the destruction of millions of dollars of property has occurred.

As will doubtless be shown when the revenue bill comes up for consideration, owing to the absolute failure of existing legislation to produce adequate revenue and owing to the several hundred million dollars appropriated or authorized for projects which were ill advised in the opinion of many or unnecessary, or certainly not urgent, outside of any amount required for preparedness, so called, an enormous deficit faces the Treasury of the United States. In my opinion, and I think the figures will bear me out when they come to be presented to the Senate, no possible revenue legislation which the majority is likely to pass at this session will relieve this condition of deficit.

I suppose it can not be said technically that the United States Treasury is bankrupt, because the taxable resources of a great country, the wealthiest in the world, with 100,000,000 inhabitants, can not be said to be wholly bankrupt, but the Treasury is certainly bankrupt as far as revenues are likely to meet expenditures, even with the added assistance of any revenue bill which the majority is likely to pass at the present Congress and before the approaching election, even with the issuance, Mr. President, of $125,000,000 of bonds to defray the expenses of the proceedings now going on along the Mexican border.

In fact, Mr. President, in addition to these wasteful and unnecessary expenditures and the failure of legislation to produce revenue it is estimated that the policy of "watchful waiting" has cost the Government during the last two years and a half nearly $200,000,000.

The last Congress expended $100,000,000 more than the preceding Congress, and this Congress has been most lavish and reckless, more so than any other Congress in the history of the American Government in time of peace. The figures are startling and astounding, Mr. President, and it has been incredible to me that no member of the majority of this Chamber has been awakened to the fact that money has been expended apparently with an utter disregard to the resources of the Federal Treasury.

There is hardly a morning that some proposition is not reported to this Chamber involving an expenditure. I have no doubt, if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] this morning when he offered an amendment of $5,000 for the purpose of beautifying the river front, had made it half a million or a million dollars it would have appealed to the majority and been speedily passed. It was too small a sum for consideration from the perspective of the party in the majority.

The other day, from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, an extraordinary appropriation was made of $2,000,000 to take care of tubercular patients who happened to go to Atlantic City, N. J., or to El Paso, Tex., and some other health resorts and who are not residents of those States. Yesterday an appropriation of one-half million dollars of doubtful propriety, although it had some precedents unfortunately, was made for the relief of certain Southern States which have been devastated by a flood.

A Senator from one of those States did not hesitate to confess to the people of the country that three-quarters of his State had been washed away, a statement little calculated to attract investment or settlement in the territory affected.

Mr. President, there is another State in the northwestern part of the country that was equally devastated by floods not long ago where the Senator informed me that nearly $200,000,000 was destroyed in a similar way, but that he would hesitate to advertise the situation of his State or to appeal to the Federal Treasury for relief. Still, on the ground of benevolence and on account of precedents, he permitted the resolution to pass.

This thing is keeping on to an incredible extent. When the people of the country come to realize the situation it will, in my opinion, have a serious effect if not a most potential and deciding effect upon the approaching election.

Some 20,000 to 30,000 additional place holders, Mr. President, requiring an annual expenditure of $40,000,000 have been imposed upon the American people, for what useful purpose has yet to be disclosed. No commission looks good apparently to the party in power unless the commissioners draw a salary unheard of a few years ago. Ten thousand dollars to each commissioner, several hundred thousands to an army of place holders, places for good Democrats all over the country expressly exempted from the civil service. Every position in the internal-revenue department is taken out of the civil service, the department for all intents and purposes handed over to politicians, without any regard for the good of the people whom that important department serves.

I, for one, Mr. President, feel that this aroused interest for economy, which I had thought our Democratic friends had almost forgotten how to spell, is ill timed when it affects the small amount in the appropriations in the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

It seems to me it is our duty while we can to take advantage of the opportunity to complete the system of parks and the various units necessary to beautify the city of Washington, which ought to be the model city in the country. So far as I am concerned, I intend to vote to retain these items, small as they are, and hope that the spirit of economy will come over the thoughts of our Democratic friends when it comes to voting $50,000,000 for a nitrate plant, or several thousand additional employees, or $50,000,000 for a shipping bill, or $11,000,000 for an armor plant, or $25,000,000 for the river and harbor improvement, when the Republican Party endeavored to save the whole amount of $42,000,000, or some $32,000,000 for a public building bill; justly termed a "pork-barrel" proposition by the newspapers of the country.

Mr. STONE. That is to say, if the buildings are not to be erected in Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there have been public buildings in Pennsylvania, but I venture to say there is no instance in Pennsylvania of the gross abuse of the erection of buildings in towns whose population and business did not justify such construction as has occurred during the last three years.

Mr. STONE. Like, for instance, some buildings in Wyoming that were put on public buildings bills at the request of my distinguished friend the junior Senator from that State—put on in the good old days of Republican rule.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—

Mr. STONE. They were put on, and the Senator from Pennsylvania thought they were very proper.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator referred to Pennsylvania. I know, as far as Pennsylvania is concerned, we have very few public buildings; and where they occur they are in cities of 30,000, 40,000, 50,000, and 100,000 inhabitants, great metropolitan centers worthy of having public buildings.

Mr. STONE. Surely there were some erected in towns of less population than that. I assert the Senator can not be correct in his statement.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Missouri occasioned this interruption by referring to Wyoming. There is not a single public building in Wyoming, when you consider the size and business of the town, that will not compare favorably with the importance and necessity for public use with public buildings in the great State of Missouri.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if this spirit of economy would only become aroused when the question is raised of appropriating $50,000,000 for building a railroad over the icebergs of Alaska—a railroad which, I am told, has never made any practical or great progress in construction—then we might take it at its true value.

Then I recall, Mr. President, that the Government is committed to an expenditure of $50,000,000 for flood control, a proposition which certainly could have waited until preparedness had been disposed of. We have been having floods for a hundred years and shall have them for a thousand more to come. This expenditure is for a purely utopian proposition, a proposition which engineers, as a rule, condemn, because it does not begin at the source of the stream to control floods, but starts low down toward the outlet of these great bodies of water.

Then, Mr. President, we have $85,000,000 to which the Government is committed, I recall, to help the States build roads—a very meritorious proposition; no one appreciates the needs of roads more than do I; but 10 years ago there would not have been a Democrat in the United States who would have dreamed of appealing to Congress for Federal aid to build roads. He would have thrown up his hands in horror at a proposition which would have been absolutely inconsistent with his views regarding State sovereignty and State rights, and from his point of view unconstitutional.

Then, Mr. President, we have $45,000,000 of extras in deficiency bills and other measures, which are not accounted for in these items which I hastily recall. We have also the comeback on the ill-advised legislation regarding the refund on imports in American bottoms, which our Democratic friends were advised by the Republicans in the House of Representatives would be in collision with the "favored-nation" clause of our treaties; a proposition which, after going through the Attorney General's office and the Court of Customs Appeals, is now pending before the Supreme Court, and is likely to draw another $30,000,000 out of the Treasury, not in the fiscal year of 1916, for the judgment can not be delivered in time, but in the fiscal year of 1917—another liability of the Government brought on by ill-advised and hastily considered legislation.

So, Mr. President, I might go on and detain the Senate with an interesting recital of extravagances and reckless expenditures made with an incredible disregard of proper financing and systematic consideration for the resources of the Treasury.

Only the other day I made inquiry of one of my Democratic colleagues as to whether or not his associates on the other side of the Chamber had any conception of the carnival of debauchery in the way of appropriations in which they were indulging, and he candidly said that he had to confess that he did not think as yet that they had any conception of the precipice which they were approaching. I am profoundly impressed now with the fact that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], the leader of the other side, has at last awakened to the startling condition which confronts the country, and which, in my opinion, if the American people had fully impressed upon their minds, would furnish ample cause, if they did not have many others, to repudiate the party responsible for this condition.

Mr. STONE. Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. NEWLANDS, and Mr. KERN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I made the proposition to strike out these items in the appropriation bill, and sounded a note of opposition to the amendment which provided for an appropriation of a million and a half dollars, or nearly so. I did not thereby intend to provoke any political discussion, nor do I intend to engage in one now.

I may, however, express my great satisfaction because a voice of reform and economy has come out of Pennsylvania, with the distinguished Senator from that State [Mr. PENROSE] as its spokesman. After listening to him on yesterday complaining because an appropriation of $2,000,000 had been made for the tuberculosis sufferers of the country, and after he had sounded a note of warning because a half million dollars had been appropriated to relieve the distress of the suffering people of the South, I had supposed he would hail with joy a proposition to strike from this bill a million and a half dollars. Instead of that, he meets the proposition with an ill-tempered political harrangue, to which I do not propose to reply.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. STONE. We will not vote just now.

Mr. President, I have served a good many years in the Senate with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. During the greater part of that service his party has been in control of this body. Then the Senator from Pennsylvania, with whom, I may say in passing, I sustain the most kindly personal relations, was always here, working heart and soul for "appropriations and the flag"; but it now happens that the Democratic Party is in control of the Senate, and that makes a great difference with the Senator. During this period—this fortunate period for the country of Democratic control—the Senator from Pennsylvania has rarely honored us with his presence. He has felt that it was of greater importance that he should be looking after his political fences in Pennsylvania than to be looking after legislation pending before Congress. All of us have looked in vain for his ponderous, potential, and pleasing presence—in fact, his most engaging presence—on the floor of the Senate. But he rarely comes.

Mr. President, it may be—and I am willing to concede the Senator's point of view—that he serves his country better by contending with those who antagonize him in the control of his party organization in Pennsylvania than by coming here and attending the sessions of the Senate, where, it is presumed, a Senator should be looking after the business of legislation. It may be that my distinguished and very good friend is doing a better service by absenting himself from the Senate and looking after Pennsylvania politics. I will not express a decided opinion as to that.

Now and then, however, he does honor us with his presence; now and then he comes down to the Capitol and pleases us by showing himself in the Senate and letting us know that he is still alive. Sometimes I forget dates and wonder whether he has just been reelected, and whether he is not coming here to be sworn in afresh; but, anyhow, he does come now and then. Personally I am always happy to see the prodigal when he returns. I never fail to go across to greet him and to congratulate him. Indeed I feel that the Senate itself is always to be congratulated whenever this great leader of Republican politics in Pennsylvania honors us with his presence. He does not ordinarily stay very long; his presence is like a flash, soon gone; but, Mr. President, every time he comes he comes to make trouble. [Laughter.] I never see him that I do not ask him something like this: "Senator, what are you here for this time? What kind of particular devilment have you come down here to precipitate on this occasion?" [laughter]; and in the same kindly spirit he replies, always, of course, disclaiming that he has any sinister purpose in his visit. He happens to be here now, and I think has been here somewhat longer than usual. I believe he has been here this time possibly several days, when usually 24 hours about covers the period of his visitations.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania has special and superior capability in one line more than another, it is to make trouble. [Laughter.] He is a statesman and has broad vision—and I am not saying this sarcastically or ironically—he is a man of large experience and large views of things, and when his party is in power he exercises his fine powers with a view to practical ends. Of course, I think his views are generally wrong, at least not in accord with mine, but I make no question as to his sincerity when he states his attitude on public questions. But now that the Democratic Party is in power his one mission in the Senate seems to be to raise the devil as far as he can. [Laughter.] That seems to be his chief business here nowadays, and about all he comes here to do, so far as I can see. He is here now on that mission, and I will venture to say that as soon as he has finished he will get into his beautiful machine and strike out for Philadelphia. It is a lovely machine to ride in, for I have ridden with him in the past and expect to in the future, and greatly enjoyed it; but I know him all the same [laughter], and I know what he is here for all the same.

If I see him here to-morrow morning after this outburst of his I will be surprised. He has just about time to get to Philadelphia by midnight, but after this spurt he may stay here for a day or so longer to avoid criticism.

Mr. President, we know our good friend from Pennsylvania comes here just to raise Cain. His action is dictated by political considerations. We know it is all pure politics. A man of his ability, really capable of great things, even as a member of the minority party, a man of great experience and personal force as he is, could be useful as an adviser and could help frame legislation for the good of the country; but that is not what he has in mind; he only wants to help frame up things for the good of the Republican Party. Mr. President, I submit it is not worthy of a man of his exceptional equipment to engage in this sort of business, and I am sorry he does it.

The Senator talks about the flood sufferers for whose relief we have just authorized an appropriation. He does not seem to approve of that action. Neither did I. The Senator from Pennsylvania and I were in accord as to that. The relief resolution was passed on a viva voce vote—passed as a sentimental proposition. I did not vote against it; neither did the Senator from Pennsylvania. Our lips were closed for the same reason.

I believe ordinarily that the State itself should take care of accidental misfortunes befalling its people instead of appealing to the Congress. If there should happen to be immediate and emergent need of aid, the Congress, if in session, might well extend some form of temporary assistance if the State was not at the moment in position to do so. That is my attitude. And I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania now if he does not agree to that?

Mr. PENROSE. What is the Senator's statement?

Mr. STONE. The Senator need not arise. If he does not agree to what I have said, he can keep his seat.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Missouri to tell me what he wants me to agree to. I have to be on my guard with the Senator from Missouri, because frequently he is a little too smart for me. [Laughter.] I will ask the Senator to state what it is he wants me to agree to.

Mr. STONE. What I asked the Senator to agree to was this: I stated that where some sudden calamity befalls a State or a part of a State, such as a disastrous flood, and Congress is in session at the time and the legislature of the State is not in session, whether the Congress might not well extend some temporary aid in the way of tents for shelter or food or seed for replanting crops destroyed?

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator want me to answer the question?

Mr. STONE. What does the Senator think of that?

Mr. PENROSE. I will answer it. I think an act of charity or benevolence always appeals to those who are kind-hearted, but I think when an individual or a government is bankrupt the first consideration ought to be that charity begins at home. My contention was not regarding the merits of the appropriation for the flood sufferers, but that the revenues are far behind the disbursements that this Congress is authorizing, and that the first thing we knew we would have a bankrupt Treasury, if we had not one already.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator favored the sentimental reason back of that appropriation.

Mr. PENROSE. I always favor acts of charity.

Mr. STONE. I know.

Mr. PENROSE. But I believe that charity can well be curtailed when bankruptcy is impending.

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator thinks that we are about to become bankrupt, and I will refrain from saying anything more about the flood sufferers.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, now that he has called upon me, I related yesterday the fact that when the Johnstown flood occurred in Pennsylvania, killing many hundred poor people—there were no millionaires swept down the Conemaugh River; they were wage earners—

Mr. STONE. And no millionaires were swept down the North Carolina and Tennessee Rivers the other day.

Mr. PENROSE. And rendering many others homeless; and when a river like the Susquehanna, which rises about every year, anyhow, and occasionally rises to a very great height, swept through the town of Williamsport, a large and flourishing community, with a wall of water 15 feet in height, destroying millions of property and causing great suffering, the United States Government was never called upon to compensate those who suffered losses, or even to feed them. They were not millionaires; they were wage earners and farmers. So I presume the Senator from Missouri would suggest that a resolution be passed to-morrow compensating the people who have had their plate-glass windows broken in New York on account of the recent explosion.

Mr. STONE. I would not.

Mr. PENROSE. The damage amounted to more than a million dollars, and I do not know whether that would appeal to the Senator's kindness of heart.

Mr. STONE. It would not; would it appeal to the Senator's?

Mr. PENROSE. No; I begin to get a little callous when I look upon the bankruptcy facing us.

Mr. STONE. Oh, then it is only the fear of bankruptcy that chills the Senator's heart.

Mr. PENROSE. That is disturbing me very much, and I see it disturbs the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as to bankruptcy; the current ordinary appropriations we are making this session are about the same that we have made heretofore for recent fiscal years.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—

Mr. STONE. The Senator started to write something down. Is not that true?

Mr. PENROSE. No, Mr. President. The Senator from Missouri says that the ordinary appropriations for the current fiscal year are about the same as we have been making heretofore. I am not prepared to argue that at this time, but I know that the last session of Congress, when there was no preparedness program, appropriated more money by a hundred million dollars than did the preceding Congress.

Mr. STONE. Why does the Senator go back to that? Neither of us can on the spur of the moment make these comparisons. This shows what the Senator is trying to do. We should be accurate in order to be fair.

Mr. PENROSE. I would say that the Senator is absolutely wrong, and that this Congress in the authorizations and actual appropriations or commitments to ill-advised, objectionable, and ill-thought-out schemes and projects of Government ownership, verging on socialism, has squandered the public money, as I have already stated, without any regard whatever to the revenues likely to come in.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, how easy it is to make a statement like that. Now, the Senator from Pennsylvania must know, and does know, that if you take off what we call preparedness appropriations for military increases, for naval increases, for coast-fortification increases, and for aerial-craft increases, amounting in all somewhere from $600,000,000 to $800,000,000—I can not at this moment state the exact amount—it would probably reduce the aggregate below, and not increase it above, the average current appropriations of recent previous years.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator will have to revise his opinion—at least, the American public will—when the figures are shown as to just what the situation is. The fact will then be disclosed that, setting aside preparedness, there is a large deficit in the Treasury due to a failure of existing legislation to produce revenue, and due to the lavish and wasteful methods by which money has been appropriated for all kinds of projects scattered all over the country.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that is simply an idle statement the Senator makes for political circulation.

Mr. PENROSE. The figures will show it. Generalities will not cover this matter.

Mr. STONE. That is what he is down here to-day for—to make just such reckless statements as this and get them out to the country.

Mr. President, as we know, we have appropriated a good many hundreds of millions of dollars for what we call preparedness. There are Senators upon the Republican side who thought we did not appropriate enough. For instance, I have heard the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] say that the appropriations for military—that is, Army—preparedness were inadequate; that they did not come up to the needs and demands of the Government and the people. My friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], here on this side, says that the Republican candidate for President substantially stated that the other night in his speech of acceptance. Here in the Senate we have added battleships and cruisers, and other things to the naval program as it came from the House. Did the Senator from Pennsylvania vote against any of these additions? [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I voted for all of them. I would have liked to see them larger.

Mr. STONE. To be sure.

Mr. PENROSE. But I still make the statement that setting aside the naval and military bills, the Senator's party, with his help, has plunged the country into bankruptcy.

Mr. STONE. Oh! The Senator means to say that if we had not made these exceptional appropriations for Army and naval purposes and other preparedness purposes we would still be bankrupt?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I say that very positively, Mr. President, and expect to show it to the Senator—bankrupt in the sense of a deficit, comparing revenues with disbursements. I have been trying to show that to the Senator for the last hour, but he was so absorbed in his own train of thought, I suppose, that he did not listen to what I was saying.

Mr. STONE. I listened to what the Senator said, but he did not satisfy me that the Nation is bankrupt.

Mr. PENROSE. I will show it later on.

Mr. STONE. Well, when? At the Senator's next visit? [Laughter.] Mr. President, I will patiently await the next appearance of my distinguished friend in the Senate. After he has consulted with his political authorities in New York and elsewhere, and makes up the statement, I shall be very glad to see it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it is always a pleasure for me to listen to the humor of the Senator from Missouri. In fact, one of the pangs I felt during my absence was that I missed his speeches. [Laughter.] I felt that they were going on here during every hour of the day in my absence—

Mr. STONE. Oh, not that often.

Mr. PENROSE (continuing). As occasion required, and when they were not serious they were apt to be disconnected and humorous. It is true that I have been away. The Senator says that I ought to have been here to aid and advise. Mr. President, one of the reasons of my absence was that the minority, as is well known, are completely shut out of the deliberations of this body. The Senator is chairman of a subcommittee—I believe there are three—of the Finance Committee. Every member of that subcommittee is a Democrat. Hearings are being held and I can not even obtain a copy of the hearings. Then, when these subcommittees are ready to report—and I understand that the subcommittee of which the Senator is chairman was held up for several weeks on account of his absence and that of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]; I do not know whether they are getting down to work now or not—they will then report to the full Democratic majority of the Finance Committee.

The Republicans will not be invited to the meeting. They will not be permitted in the room. They will not be permitted near the door, lest they might overhear some of the differences of opinion and altercations which I am told are occurring among the Democrats themselves over the revenue bill. [Laughter.] Then when the Democratic majority has received the reports from the subcommittees a Democratic caucus of Senators will lock itself in a room and proceed to legislate in direct violation, in my opinion, of the spirit of the Constitution, which requires each House to keep a journal of its proceedings. [Laughter.] We have no journal of their proceedings, and all we know of what happens in the Democratic caucus is what we get from the White House. So what is the use in staying here, Mr. President, to witness these mysterious proceedings behind locked doors? Witness the case with the present revenue bill. After long and secret consideration the bill is presented to the full Committee on Ways and Means, reported immediately out to the House of Representatives, without the minority having a particle of time to study its monstrous and ridiculous provisions—

Mr. STONE. Why does the Senator, without knowing what they are, denounce them as monstrous and ridiculous, except on the theory that the Democratic Party—

Mr. PENROSE. Because no one knows better than the Senator from Missouri that they are monstrous and ridiculous; and I believe he will be one of those who will endeavor to correct the monstrous and ridiculous provisions of the bill as it has come over to the Senate from the House.

Mr. STONE. The Senator both compliments and upbraids me.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not saying the Senator from Missouri is responsible for the bill as it comes from the House. I credit him with too much intelligence. I know that his absolute sense of fairness would have insisted upon a duty on zinc where a duty was put on copper. [Laughter.]

Mr. STONE. Right at that point—

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit for just one moment—

Mr. STONE. I will not interfere.

Mr. PENROSE (continuing). To finish a brief account of the methods of Democratic legislation—

Mr. STONE. Please do not go into all that.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall soon be through. I know it is a sad and painful story.

The bill is brought into the House. Representatives are told to hurry up. They can not read the bill. They can speak for five minutes only. A hasty debate is had, and the bill passes, and the American public has no knowledge of the contents of the measure until it is passed. The newspapers have had no opportunity to discuss its monstrous provisions. Why, a bricklayer, Mr. President, could have drawn as good a revenue bill to collect money for the Government of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Why does the Senator specify a bricklayer? Is it on the theory that he represents the lowest order of intelligence?

Mr. PENROSE. Because he does not have to work on rainy days [laughter] and could put in a little time on it. Then, Mr. President, the bill comes over to the Senate. A full meeting of the Finance Committee is called. Unfortunately, that was on one of those occasions when I was absent. It would not have made any difference. The Republicans were permitted to stay in the room only two or three minutes. Then the Democrats locked the door and proceeded to appoint their subcommittees, all Democrats.

Mr. STONE. When was that?

Mr. PENROSE. When the full committee was called together. Then the same proceeding will occur here. We will have the full committee, as I have described, and the caucus and the White House, and the information from the President's secretary as to what is to be done.

What is the use in staying here, Mr. President? I have been a Member of this body for 20 years, and have been reasonably faithful in my attention to my legislative duties. When the present party came into power the charge was made that the Republicans had adopted these methods of secrecy, and that they only conferred with a few; and I got the impression that the whole mass of the American people were going to surround the White House and advise the President and the Democracy as to what was in the minds of the plain people on all this reform legislation; but I doubt whether in the history of the Government the White House has ever been more inaccessible to low and high, small and big, than during the last three years. Therefore, Mr. President, I have taken advantage of my opportunities to go home and mix with the plain people and derive inspiration from that association, which to me is as refreshing as—

Mr. STONE. A shower bath.

Mr. PENROSE (continuing). A drink of water from a pure spring upon a mountain top.

The Senator says that I never objected to appropriation bills when the Republicans were in the majority. I am prompted by a liberal spirit, Mr. President, and it takes a good deal to make me niggardly in the disbursement of public money, and sometimes in the case of my own expenditures; but when the Republicans were passing appropriation bills, and when there was no objection made, the fact stood out, in striking contrast to the present condition, that every year there was a surplus of $100,000,000 or more in the Treasury, and we were constructing the Panama Canal largely out of current revenues.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has concluded his remarks?

Mr. PENROSE. For the present, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. There is more coming?

Now, Mr. President, I have yielded for quite a while, in order that the Senator might complete his speech. I wished him to complete it before he leaves. I shall not attempt to answer it. I would not like to say it is not worth answering, but the purpose of it is so manifest, so patent, so barefaced that I do not care to waste the time of the Senate in bothering about it. It is a fact which can not be truthfully disputed that except for the extraordinary expenses incident to what we call the preparedness program, and which program the Senator supported—I say "supported"; he says he wanted a larger program; he wanted more than we were willing to give—except for that, the current appropriations are substantially equal to the appropriations made by the Congresses of recent years, and this whether the one party or the other was in the majority. Why should such reckless statements be made as the Senator makes?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the Senator know that the last Republican Congress the Government disbursements were about $945,000,000, and that this Congress already has passed appropriation bills, and have appropriation bills in conference, in all amounting to $1,400,000,000, and about $314,000,000 of that is extra, for the Army, Navy, and fortifications?

Mr. THOMAS. I beg to correct the Senator. It is over $390,000,000. These are the latest figures taken from the Treasury Department.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like—

Mr. STONE. Oh, I am not going to get into these figures.

Mr. LIPPITT. Let us imagine the figures for a little while.

Mr. PENROSE. A few millions one way or the other do not make any difference. If the Senator will permit me—

Mr. STONE. The Senator can put in his figures.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not going to put anything in the Record. I notice here, in a Washington paper, an advertisement of a dentist with an imposing picture of a set of false teeth; and, evidently with a realization of the fact that the expense of obtaining these articles on account of the war in Europe might worry the person who needed them, he says: "Easy, convenient payments can be arranged"; and then, what might well be the watchword of the Democracy, inscribed on their banner, the injunction, "Don't worry about money." [Laughter.]

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania and his colleague do not exhibit false teeth, but they do put a whole false face before the Senate and the country. Having no real issues, they try to make false ones. I know, and every Senator knows, that the aggregate appropriations, aside from the extraordinary appropriations for preparedness, are substantially what they have been for a number of years past. I do not want to pile up a mass of figures and make comparisons. That will be done in due time. I have not this mass of data at hand, but I know I am stating what the real facts are.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the constant reiteration of a statement is not going to persuade the Senate. I suggest that the Senator produce his figures.

Mr. STONE. I have not especially reiterated any statement, except to meet statements iterated and reiterated by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know no reason why he should suddenly ask me to produce a mass of figures. He does not produce any; he contents himself with mere assertions.

Mr. PENROSE. I produced a number of cases of extravagant and reckless expenditures.

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator talked about this appropriation for flood sufferers and about expensive public buildings, and things of that kind. Why, Mr. President, we have not even brought in a public-building bill this year.

Mr. PENROSE. It is in the House.

Mr. STONE. I do not know about that. I know it is not here.

Mr. PENROSE. It will get here.

Mr. STONE. I do not know whether it will get here or not; and if so we will deal with it when it comes; but so far as public buildings are concerned, we have been constructing them for a long time in all the States. I asked the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], when my friend from Pennsylvania brought this subject up, to tell us about some appropriations out there for public buildings in towns of three or four or five thousand people. When the Republicans were in control here, they appropriated $100,000 and more—I am speaking somewhat without definite figures—but large sums, from $100,000 to $150,000, to put up public buildings in Wyoming. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he never had a building for a town under—did the Senator say 30,000 people?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, perhaps—

Mr. STONE. I want to look up this matter. Did the Senator say 30,000?

Mr. PENROSE. I wish the Senator would look up all his facts. It seems to me that the situation is entirely altered when you tacitly consent, sitting quietly in your seat, to have a little town get a public building when there is a surplus in the Treasury; but I claim that the line ought to be drawn when there is a deficit in the Treasury. The Senator charges me with making trouble. I only made an innocent comment on the aroused interest in economy expressed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator is still concerned about the Treasury?

Mr. PENROSE. It is economy that I am after.

Mr. STONE. Oh, I see. That is the one thing that burdens the heart of the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a desire for economy not based on an admiration of that proposition in the abstract, but from stern necessity, because it will be shown at the proper time that even with the revenue bill now pending there will be many million dollars deficit in the Treasury.

Mr. STONE. There will be no such thing; and I am not going to be turned aside by a mere repetition of that unported assertion. The Senator stated here that no public building—I wish him to tell me whether I am quoting him correctly or not—had been provided for any town in Pennsylvania under a population of 30,000 or thereabout.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, well—

Mr. STONE. Is not that what the Senator said?

Mr. PENROSE. I do not confine myself to that. I say that is the general rule, and they are all very substantial metropolitan centers. Whether there has been any exception to that rule or not I can not say, but I know that most of the public buildings in Pennsylvania are of that character. I do not think that is very material, however.

Mr. STONE. Oh, well, then, what did the Senator say it for?

Mr. PENROSE. Because the Senator started in—

Mr. STONE. I did not. The Senator said that in his opening speech, before ever I said a word about it.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator started in to cast reflections on the public buildings in Pennsylvania.

Mr. STONE. No; the Senator from Pennsylvania made the statement I have referred to before I spoke of the matter at all.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the RECORD will show differently.

Mr. STONE. I think it will not show differently. That illustrates how the Senator gets up here and just fires off at random. He shoots at whatever is in sight, and he shoots whether there is anything in sight or not, with the possible hope of hitting something somewhere over the hill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. What would be the Senator's idea of a town that is worthy of a public building from the point of view of population? Has he ever thought that out, roughly speaking?

Mr. STONE. What is the Senator's idea?

Mr. PENROSE. I could not tell. I have no definite idea. I addressed the inquiry to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Why to me?

Mr. PENROSE. This looks too much like trying to obtain the password in a secret lodge.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has been here longer than I have. Now, let him tell me what his idea is. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator can not get me to give him the password. I should like him to tell me what his idea is.

Mr. STONE. Well, I decline. I follow the Senator's example.

Mr. PENROSE. Then perhaps it is just as well that the Senator did decline, because I have here a memorandum—and I think every Senator will be impressed with the partisan extravagance of the proposition—that a bill passed the Senate two days ago for a public building in Tucson, Ariz.

Mr. STONE. Tucson, not Tuxon.

Mr. PENROSE. Tucson. The population is 15,000 people. Has the Senator any idea what the amount of the appropriation was?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have.

Mr. PENROSE. It was $325,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir; and if it had been in Pennsylvania it would have been $600,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. I would not have referred to this painful fact if I had known the Senator from Arizona was in the Chamber; but that seems to me reckless extravagance in the face of a bankrupt Treasury—appropriating $325,000 for a public building in a town of not more than 15,000 inhabitants.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for a moment?

Mr. STONE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am glad the Senator from Pennsylvania saw fit to take up a question of which he apparently knows as little as he does about the whole debate he has been giving to the Senate to-day on the general appropriation bills. The Senator knows nothing about the location of Tucson. He could not even pronounce its name. It shows with what recklessness the Senator sees fit to inveigh against a party. I am responsible for the passage of the bill, but I did not get nearly as much as I think the city ought to have had. It is on a line, practically, between the great City of Mexico and the railroad that will be completed as soon as the trouble in that country is over, if it ever is.

Mr. PENROSE. How much did that city get? The Senator says he did not get as much as a neighboring city?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I said I did not get as much as I introduced the bill for.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, well, that is unfortunate. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And the only difference is that under Republican rule the Senator would have gotten it, no matter what he put it in for.

Mr. PENROSE. What was the amount for which the Senator asked originally?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I asked for $400,000, and ought to have had it.

Mr. PENROSE. We all sympathize with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator does not wait until another Senator has finished to interrupt. He just chips in when he pleases. Does the Senator know what business is to be transacted and how many Government bureaus have to be covered in this building?

Mr. PENROSE. No, Mr. President. I have been there.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then why did the Senator select this particular one?

Mr. PENROSE. I have been there. There are more coyotes in the surrounding country than there are voters. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There are not as many coyotes around there as there are regular timber wolves in Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know how many there are there.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator ought to know. He has been around among them and those people the Senator mentioned a while ago and said he had been around among for the first time in his life. He heard from them, and he stayed away from here, and did not mix with any of the appropriations committees, probably thinking that he could make this assault on the Democratic Party, and saw fit, in his magnificent indictment of the party, to select the city of Tucson—"Tuxon," as he calls it—for the play of his imagination.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, after this town gets this building, of course people will hear of it more often, and be more careful how they pronounce the name.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; and when this town gets the building the Senator probably will be able to pronounce the name.

Mr. PENROSE. As the traveler approaches it will appear to be all building and no town.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You see, there is the same interruption again.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say he had been there, and yet he did not know the name of the town.

But, Mr. President, I am going to conclude. I have talked too long already. The Senator says that he is very much opposed to the shipping bill. There is some temptation to go into that, but I refrain. I will wait until the Senator honors us with his presence again and takes up the shipping bill. Then, maybe, we will discuss it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator that I am going to be here every day until the gavel falls in October.

Mr. STONE. Oh! From now on?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes, sir; until October, when we adjourn.

Mr. STONE. I despair. [Laughter.] I should like to know if the Senator is really in earnest about that—that we are going to have the Senator here, with these outbursts, right along until we adjourn?

Mr. PENROSE. They are just beginning.

Mr. STONE. It would be so much better if the Senator would go away and come back again. We are used to that. Besides it would be better for the Senator's health and pleasure, and in a way better for us all.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word about the exact matter before the Senate. I did offer an amendment to the pending bill to appropriate $175,000 to purchase a strip of land lying between the Zoological Park and Connecticut Avenue. At the time I offered the amendment I stated that I thought it would be a wise policy if all these really desirable acquisitions—that is, the Dean tract, the Patterson tract, and other tracts for park purposes—might be delayed for future action by the Congress. So I have thought and still think. But if it should be the judgment of the Senate that all these park projects should be adopted and disposed of at this time, then the one I had in mind when I offered my amendment I hold to be not second in importance to any of the others.

If the Senator in charge of this bill could see his way clear to lay all these projects aside for the time being I would be much gratified; I think it would be in the interest of prudent legislation; but if the Senator from Maryland, and in charge of the bill, and the Senator from Virginia, chairman of the committee, and the other members of the great Committee on Appropriations think we ought to enter upon this scheme of park extensions at this time, I find it difficult to get my consent to antagonize the authority of their opinion. Privately I am for these improvements. I am for beautifying our National Capital and making it the finest capital city in the world, for this is the Capital of our Nation—but I think we should not proceed with this work by leaping headlong without regard to consequences or circumstances, but rather proceed in the judgment and sound discretion.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from Indiana to noncur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. While I believe that one of the great assets of the city is beautiful parks, I do feel that it is a wise proposition at this time to halt in the matter of such appropriations.

Mr. President, because of my love for the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], because we have so many tastes and habits in common, I feel that I must say just a word. I think the Senator from Missouri was in a way uncharitable. He said the Senator from Pennsylvania was not here. Of course he was not here. He had reasons for not being here. But I want to say how fortunate it is for the Senator from Pennsylvania that this little opportunity should come just now. He has been away, of course; he was so busy, and hence he could not do it before. It is a nice little campaign talk. But he does not believe just what he says in his own heart—that this is a bankrupt Nation.

The Senator speaks about the mission of watchful waiting that has been the part of the President of the United States. He said it cost the Government $200,000,000; but God only knows what it would have cost the Government had the watchful waiting policy been set aside and the policy of the few Republican Senators on the other side invoked, and we had been plunged into war. It would have cost us many times $200,000,000, to say nothing of the death of many brave men.

But this I would have the Senator from Pennsylvania know. It should be read from the housetops, and on the street corners, and in the blacksmith shop. This Nation has been kept out of war. We are at peace with all the world through this policy of watchful waiting.

I came across a short article that showed that we have not all gone to the dogs; that at least Pennsylvania had not gone to the dogs. It was in yesterday's paper. I found that the Pennsylvania Railroad has within six months realized something over $50,000,000. That does not look as though we have gone to the dogs.

But another thought struck me as the Senator proceeded. He spoke about the appropriation for good roads as being costly. I do not know any other man in this land who gets more comfort and benefit from good roads than the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator has grown to be a byword with us in New Jersey. Living just across the river we frequently see the Senator with his magnificent automobile, that is known throughout Pennsylvania and is known over in New Jersey by the significant if not elegant name of Red Devil. It is known as the Red Devil from Pennsylvania. The Senator goes down in this Red Devil over the splendid roads of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and we shall have still better ones when we utilize our proportion of Federal aid. I have forgotten how much Pennsylvania gets under it, but a very liberal sum, I think something like $200,000 out of the $85,000,000 road appropriation. When he comes down the hills and through the dales with his Red Devil the chickens fly, the dogs and cats scamper, and the calves fairly bleat out in agony and run to shelter. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, even though you are in the suction of the Red Devil there is no danger. It will not oscillate or vibrate very much, for it is well ballasted. Always in the back seat you will find the magnificent Apollo, the Senator from Pennsylvania, sitting there with cigar in mouth, glorying in the blessings of a good-road system.

But, Mr. President, as to the charge that the Senator was derelict in duty because he was not here. How could the Senator from Missouri be so cruel! There was a reason why the splendid Apollo from Pennsylvania was not here. If you doubt my word I am willing to bring you, not documents from New York City, for I know they are below par with the Senator from Utah and the Senator from New Hampshire. Whenever I quote them they say, "Oh, you come here with your New York papers." No; I am not coming here with a New York paper; I come with one near the central throne. I come with a paper from Philadelphia. I will read it. It is in a most kindly tone, and I ask Senators to listen. In the headline it says:

Busy PENROSE—

Then it proceeds as I shall read. There are so many volumes of papers in Philadelphia this may have escaped the Senator:

BUSY PENROSE.

Our senior Senator is so busy that he never knows whether he ought to be in the Senate or out of it. Usually it happens that when he is there something happens outside, and when he is away something happens there. There never was such an harassed, overworked, and everywhere-demanded man as BOIES PENROSE.

A few weeks ago an important provision regarding the Philadelphia Navy Yard was dropped from the bill because Senator PENROSE was not at the meeting of the Senate Naval Committee. It was currently reported that he had not been seen around the Capitol for weeks. Some unkind remark was made in this city about the absence of the Senator from the committee room when the question of equipping the Philadelphia Navy Yard for the construction of capital ships was up, and now the heroic statesman can't be pulled away from his desk by the most seductive occasions—

He was needed here and hence he stayed here—

The Senator's Philadelphia office announced yesterday that he would be compelled by his senatorial duties at Washington to remain away from the most interesting occasion of the notification of Mr. Hughes of his nomination.

Did you ever hear of such a slave to duty as BOIES PENROSE? That was going to be a wonderfully interesting affair in New York, but the Senator had duties to perform in Washington, and nothing would pull him away from the post of public service. His faithfulness at his station dates back several weeks to the Philadelphia Navy Yard episode.

So I will not hide the Senator. He was busy; it is a big Commonwealth; and the Senator, outside of some of his miserable political notions, fills this place splendidly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole for the purchase of what is known as the Patterson tract.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations, who are looking after the interests of the District of Columbia, had no idea they would give rise to an opportunity for speeches for political purposes. In considering these matters they sought to do what was for the best interests of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia.

In regard to the land for park purposes, the question which is before the Senate at this time, we had a great many persons attending the hearings of the committee. We felt that it was our duty in a proper way to make appropriations for parks such as are considered absolutely necessary so far as the beautification of the city and the accommodation of the people in the city are concerned.

We felt that this land for park purposes would not always be obtainable. In fact, there is one piece here that has been offered for which there is an appropriation of $625,000. The lowest at which that piece of property has been offered in the past, as we learned, was $900,000, and from the amount for which it is taxed we regarded it as very cheap property and a timely occasion to purchase it. So in regard to the Patterson tract.

We have not appropriated more than twice the amount of the revenues from the citizens of Washington and of the District of Columbia. There is sufficient money from the taxes received by the District of Columbia to pay their portion of all we have put into this bill. We felt after a thorough investigation of these matters that it was in the interest of the city of Washington, and we felt that it was our duty to put the items into this appropriation bill. Of course it is for the Senate to determine as to whether they shall remain or not. The time may come when we will not be able to get these properties. The time is at hand, probably, when we can not make the improvements that we have provided in this bill because the properties that we propose to purchase will in all probability go into the hands of others and be used for other purposes.

We felt, in view of the fact that the District of Columbia had raised her amount of the money to enable us to buy this property, it was the proper thing to do. We have put it in the bill, and I hope it will stay there, subject to the conference with the House. The items may go out; we do not know. The House conferees may not agree with us, and if they do not, they will not be kept in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the committee on page 101 with reference to what is known as the Patterson property.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word. This tract of land lies in a portion of the city thickly populated where they have not a breathing space of any kind in the shape of a park. It has been urged upon the committee year in and year out for several years that the people in that portion of the city are entitled to some consideration. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia recommended it, the estimate came through the proper channel advising us to make this investment, and largely for the reason that we felt there had been a great neglect of that part of the city, it was put in the bill, and I hope it will remain in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word with relation to the purchase of land for parks in the District of Columbia. If there is a city in the world that has parks, Washington City has them now. With the great Rock Creek Park, with its hundreds and hundreds of acres; with the great Potomac Park, with its hundreds and hundreds of acres; with the Mall extending from the Capitol to the Washington Monument, it seems to me it is a useless expenditure of money, unless it is purely for the gratification of an æsthetic taste, which, if the Government had unlimited money, it might well indulge in, but which it seems to me in these times, as the Senator from Indiana has said, is simply an extravagance upon the part of the Government of the United States.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I hope that the amendments which have been made to the bill providing for the purchase of land for park purposes will be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). In the absence of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Mr. President, I desire to make a statement preliminary to asking to be excused from voting. I happen to own a small temporary home in the vicinity of the ground proposed to be taken. Its value may be to some extent affected by the establishment of a park in the vicinity. I therefore feel that it would be improper for me to vote upon the question, and I ask to be excused from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri, for the reason given, asks leave to be excused from voting. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote to strike out all of these appropriations.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. THOMPSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 37, as follows:

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next reserved amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next reserved amendment is the amendment relative to the Dean tract.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I wish to say, on behalf of the committee, that it seems to be the opinion of the Senate that this is not the time to purchase parks. The committee regards the Patterson tract as one of the most desirable of such proposed purchases. Therefore I wish to say, in behalf of the committee, that we shall offer no opposition whatever to the striking out of all that has been proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. GALLINGER. But in doing so, Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me, we have every assurance that we shall never have so good an opportunity to purchase the Dean tract as we have this year.

Mr. KERN. The power of condemnation will always reside in Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I understand that, but if houses are put on it, if Mr. Wardman gets possession of it, we will have to condemn a good deal of valuable property.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I think I have stated that that property was offered to us for nearly $300,000 less than it had ever been offered for previously. We were warned that the people who have held it would probably not hold it any longer, because it was not a source of revenue; that they will dispose of it so that they can get revenue out of it. The result will be that the property will be disposed of for the purpose of placing buildings thereon, and the Government will probably never again get the opportunity to buy it. The parties who own it felt that they wanted the city to have it for park purposes, and gave us what was equivalent to an option that we might have it at the amount named in this bill—$625,000—which is, I understand, less than the property is assessed for.

However, the decision is with the Senate. We exercised our best judgment as to what we thought was for the best interests of the city of Washington, and in accordance with our view that this ought to be made a great and a beautiful city. Of course the Senate is the body to determine the matter. For that reason the committee will not make any objection to the amendment which the Senator from Indiana may move to take all these propositions out of the bill.

Mr. KERN. The question is on concurring in the amendments, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment for the acquisition of what is known as the Dean property. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it. The "noes" have it, and the amendment is not concurred in.

The next reserved amendment is the one in regard to the Klinge Ford Valley. The question is on concurring in that amendment.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there were some parks, as I remember, or additions to parks, put in by amendment on the floor of the Senate. There is no reason why they should remain in the bill if the provisions for other parks are to go out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The one inserted on the motion of the Senator from Missouri has gone out.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Missouri has himself stated that he thought it ought to go out with the rest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has gone out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair put the question, and the amendment was not concurred in. Are there further amendments reserved to be voted on in the Senate?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, there were four reservations made by me. The first was as to two committee amendments; the next was as to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]; and the next was as to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], which comes in after line 5, on page 112. Have they all been voted on or have only three been voted on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands they have all been disposed of.

Mr. KERN. My first reservation was as to the committee amendment on page 111.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment providing for the purchase of the Dean property has been disposed of; the amendment relating to the purchase of the Patterson property has been disposed of, and the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has been disposed of. Has there been anything else reserved?

Mr. KERN. There is the property covered by the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], of which I have just spoken, which is on page 112, after line 5, providing for the purchase of Klinge Ford valley, making an appropriation of $154,349 for the purchase of the land and $16,000 for the improvement of a street adjacent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has gone out.

Mr. KERN. Then, in addition to the committee amendments, there was an amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] appropriating $175,641.43, and coming in on page 111, after line 24—

Mr. GALLINGER. That has gone out.

Mr. KERN. Providing for a readjustment of the National Zoological Park boundaries, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is will the Senate concur in that amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to inquire from the Senator in charge of the bill if this is the purchase to protect the edge of the park from the encroachment of little buildings?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Georgia the committee did not put this amendment in the bill, and knows nothing about it whatever. Furthermore, the Senator from Missouri himself indicated, as I understand, that he did not want this amendment to remain in the bill if the other provisions in regard to the purchase of land were stricken out on account of the expense, and, therefore, they have all gone out.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was not concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next reserved amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, line 6, in the items for the health department, there was inserted, as in Committee of the Whole, "assistant chief, $1,400."

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the committee and of the Senate to a certain condition which exists in one portion of the city. On the Georgetown car line as you go from the main city into Georgetown, on what is called the G Street line, you pass a large gas-storage tank of a capacity of I do not know how many thousands or millions of cubic feet, and that gas tank is a nuisance to an entire community for the reason that it leaks. As you pass it on the car the odor is offensive at all times, and sometimes almost stifling.

I notice that some of the Senators smile, but the gas escaping from it is a noxious gas. It settles down like a blanket over an entire community of several squares and acts as a depressant to the vital forces of life. There are hundreds upon hundreds of little children who are being raised in that locality. Their homes are situated there, and they have no way of escaping from its baneful influence.

Imagine during the hot weather which has been prevailing, while at the same time the city is threatened with an epidemic of infantile paralysis, which always finds its victims among children who are undernourished and underfed and who do not possess sufficient vitality to resist the germs—imagine in this hot weather which we have had a child in a tenement house trying to get enough cool fresh air to enable him or her to sleep and rest during the night having to breathe a noxious gas of sufficient power and strength to disorganize its blood cells and lower its vitality to the danger point. It is wrong.

I notice in the bill that the committee has made an addition to the force of the health office of another assistant chief, a sanitary inspector, if you please, with a salary of $1,400. If he could be specifically assigned to this work, I think he might be useful, and I should then like to see the item stay in the bill; but if the sanitary inspectors of this city are doing their work in a manner which allows an entire community, a section embracing thousands of people, to be placed under a condition which will inevitably result in the death of many of the younger portions of the community, the item had better go out and we had better take half the money and hire a plumber, and then take some more money of it and buy him some red lead and keep him busy stopping the leaks in that gas tank. It is a public nuisance, and it goes further than that, Mr. President. It shows a negligence upon the face of things that no man can excuse. Any inspector, any street-car conductor, a blind man, more particularly, perhaps, could not go through there without knowing that that tank is a nuisance, and yet it has continued leaking for over a year, to my personal knowledge. It is little short of criminal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LANE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator called the attention of the health department to this matter?

Mr. LANE. No; I have not. If they can not smell it there is no use of my calling their attention to it, not a particle in the world. If an inspector can go within a quarter of a mile of that gas tank without knowing what is the matter there is no use of bothering with him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not agree to the indictment against the health office of this District. Dr. Woodward is a very competent man and has the health interests of the District at heart. He has a reasonable force under him, but I can not conceive that Dr. Woodward, if he has any knowledge of this matter, would permit it for a single hour. Now, I do not know anything about this leak. Is it connected with the Washington Gas Light Co.'s great plant?

Mr. LANE. I do not know. It is connected with one of the plants that supply gas, either in Georgetown or in Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. On this side of Rock Creek?

Mr. LANE. Right near the new Rock Creek Bridge, on the Georgetown car line, on this side of that creek.

Mr. GALLINGER. I never yet have gone near a gas plant when there have not been disagreeable odors, and there may be a leak there. It is inconceivable to me, however, because I can not imagine that that corporation would permit it for a moment. I do not think they would want to lose their gas. They are pretty scrupulous about those things. They want to have pay for their gas.

Mr. LANE. That is right, Mr. President, I have no doubt. The fact of the matter is, I guess, that the gas manufactured in this city contains an excess of sulphur producing what is known as sulphurous acid, which, when standing, finally forms into sulphuric acid, and it eats out the pipes and the bottom of the tank, and they can not stop it. I have had to repair some of the pipes in the house I live in for that very reason.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is one other matter I call to the Senator's attention. This is not a new official that we have provided for. It is simply taking one, as the Senator will perceive, out of eight inspectors, and giving him a little higher salary because he is more competent. The Senator will observe that we have reduced the eight to seven, so that he is not a new appointee.

Mr. LANE. All right, Mr. President. Now, I am not acquainted with the chief inspector or any of the other inspectors; but if they have not noticed that there is an excessive waste and loss of gas there, they are probably suffering from what is called chronic atrophic nasal catarrh, and have lost their sense of smell and their ability to detect deleterious odors, for it is so strong that at times when a passer-by is going through there on one of those cars it will irritate his throat to the extent of causing him to cough, and to cough violently and painfully, until he passes through the entire district. It is a small matter, and yet in a way it is a grave matter. It is a matter in which the lives of the people are involved, for their vitality is lowered to such an extent that they can not be healthy human beings; and the inspectors have overlooked it, for the condition exists. I will invite the Senator from New Hampshire to take a trip out there with me this evening or any evening on my way home, so that he will realize that the condition does exist.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I were going to take a trip with the Senator I would go first to the health office, and if I did not get relief there I would go to the Public Utilities Commission. There is a remedy for this that ought not to bother Congress.

Mr. LANE. Well, Mr. President, we are trying to build up the city of Washington. There has been an attempt here to purchase parks, at an expenditure of over a million dollars, to beautify the city.

We have adopted the half-and-half plan. A part of the responsibility is upon Congress, and it is just as well to know these facts, for they are important. It goes further than that even, for a type of gas which will eat out the walls of a tank container will also eat out the pipes which pass through the community from the tank, and we have this gas escaping in an insidious manner into the houses of many of the people, lowering their vitality and increasing the death rate, if you please. I suggest—and I should like to get the consent of the members of this committee to this—that we do away with this assistant chief and hire a good, sensible plumber, and he will find out these dangerous leaks for us. These gentlemen evidently have not discovered it, for it is a condition that has existed for years, I am told. Would the Senator accept a proposition something like this—to employ a practical man, a man that knows how to detect and stop leaks in the service of this city? It is needed, and badly needed, all over the city. There are leaks of the gas mains and the service pipes in hundreds of places in this city.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, we have a plumbers' board, and they employ plumbers. Now, I simply suggest to the Senator that if he wants to employ a plumber, that is his privilege, and he can pay out a little money for the Washington Gas Light Co. if he chooses to do so. It is inconceivable to me, as I said a moment ago, that there is any leakage there that is of any consequence, because the gas light company do not want to lose any money. But however that may be, it is the duty of the health office to look after this matter. We pay them for it, and we give Dr. Woodward all the force that he asks for in the way of inspectors, and if they are neglecting their duties they ought to be called to account.

Mr. LANE. That is exactly what I am trying to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet the Senator has not taken the trouble to go to the health office to make complaint about this matter that has been so annoying to him. I appreciate the fact that we ought not to endanger the health or the life of a single person, big or little, old or young; and I know just how anxious Dr. Woodward is to keep down the death rate in the District of Columbia, because that is a tribute to him; and I feel sure that the Senator will get all the relief that possibly can be given if he consults the health officer.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, it is no source of annoyance to me. I merely pass through it. The annoyance to me is but temporary, but the condition out there is really a serious one. Here we are providing salaries and men to do this work for the people, and it is not being done, and it makes me wonder at how many other places in this bill we are paying out money for similar service. The condition is a bad one, a dangerous one, an inexcusable one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment reserved is by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], on page 46, line 9, relative to the amount appropriated for the swimming pool.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not opposed to this amendment. I did not reserve it because I had any opposition to it. If the money could be utilized, I would favor its increase, if anything; but I reserved this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to a matter which, it seems to me, ought to be called to the attention of Congress, and I wish it could be called to the attention of everybody in the District of Columbia—the fact that we have a condition existing here in regard to bathing facilities that needs attention and needs remedying.

A couple of years ago, I think on the sundry civil bill, the Senate put an amendment providing an appropriation sufficient to build a large bathing house and for the preparation of a bathing beach on what is known as the Tidal Basin down here. It passed the Senate, but went out in conference. The Tidal Basin is a body of water with which all the Senators are acquainted, I presume, in Potomac Park, surrounded by land for nearly the entire distance, with an opening into the river and an opening into what is known as Washington Channel, where the boats come up from the lower Potomac River. It contains 110 acres. It is from 6 to 9 feet deep. Protected as it is by these banks, it would be an excellent place for swimming; and that is what the Senate thought, I presume, when it agreed to this amendment on the bill, and provided for the construction of bathing beaches, two of them—one for white people and one for colored people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senate conferees contended for that amendment just as long as they possibly could with propriety.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am not finding fault with the conferees. I want particularly to say here that the chairman of the conferees on the part of the Senate, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] came to see me in regard to it—I presume because I had proposed the amendment—and took me with him, and with him I consulted with the physicians who had been called in by the conferees; and it seemed to me, as it seemed to the conferees, that we must for the time being, at least, surrender, because the health department reported to the conferees, after examination of the water of the Tidal Basin, that it was not fit for bathing, and that it would be injurious to health if bathing was permitted in those waters.

I made an investigation later on and found out that what they said was true in regard to the sewers; that all the way up nearly to the District line there were sewers coming into the Potomac River; and the doctors found upon examination of the water that a considerable quantity of the impurities came through the opening, and was always contained in the waters of the tidal basin. So, while the city needed it, while everybody who has looked into the question realizes that the city of Washington ought to have something of that kind for its boys and girls and its men and women; while there ought to be a public bathing beach and that would be as good as any, yet when we were confronted with the officials of the health department who said that it was not safe to bathe there, we surrendered and gave up.

What was the result? Why, Mr. President, notwithstanding the health department made an examination and reported that these waters were unfit to bathe in, and Congress therefore decided—at least until the sewage could be diverted to some other place—not to build bathing beaches, notwithstanding that, the Government has rented to a private individual the right to conduct a bathing beach down there on the tidal basin, and it is going on now; and only last Sunday it was reported to me by one of the officers that more than 700 people went in bathing in the tidal basin. Every one of them had to pay a fee. The private individual had to get his "rake-off." I am not finding fault with the private individual or with those who pay the fee; but we have this condition presented to us:

We proposed, at public expense, to provide for a public bathing beach there which would be free and moderate in every respect, and we are confronted with the objection from the health department that it is unsafe, that is dangerous to life and to health to permit people to bathe in those waters; and then the right to conduct a private bathing beach is rented, and the Government is getting a fee out of it—getting $500 a year from the man who is operating that bathing beach there—and he opens it to the public and charges a fee, and permits the people to go bathing in the very waters that the Government officials have condemned.

I only wanted to call attention to the condition. I understand that the concession that has been granted to this man for three years will expire next April. It seems to me that if attention could be called to it, if those waters are unfit for bathing, the Government ought not to be a party to taking a fee from people to go into waters that are dangerous. We ought to prevent people from bathing there, or we ought to construct a bathing beach and make it absolutely free.

I have no objection to the amendment being concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The SECRETARY. The Senator also reserved an amendment on page 119, lines 16 to 22, relative to 70-cent gas.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on this amendment I desire to be heard, and I have some objection to the amendment. I should like to have the attention of the Senate.

The bill as it comes from the House provides in section 6, page 119 of the bill, as follows:

That hereafter no part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used for the payment to the Washington Gas Light Co. or the Georgetown Gas Light Co. for any gas furnished by said companies for use in any of the public buildings of the United States or the District of Columbia at a rate in excess of 70 cents per 1,000 cubic feet.

Mr. President, that provision, in substance, has been in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for several years. Several years ago, in March, 1914, an amendment was put on the appropriation bill here in the Senate that limited the price that would be paid for gas by the Government of the United States to the Washington Gas Light Co. to 70 cents per 1,000 cubic feet. That amendment went on in the shape of a limitation after a general amendment had been stricken out on a point of order. The House, ever since that, have put the language into the District appropriation bill. They have enlarged it so as to cover both gas companies and the entire District and all appropriations, whether made in this bill or other bills, appropriating for the payment of gas in the District of Columbia.

The Senate committee this time, for some reason, has seen fit to strike that provision out of the bill; and that is the amendment that I reserved for a separate vote. I have heard no reason given why that should be done.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will allow me, I will call his attention to a statement before the committee by Mr. Darlington, I suppose counsel for the company, a very eminent lawyer—I presume the Senator knows him—in which, on page 336, he states very clearly the reasons why it should go out.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator read them? Or give the volume to me, and I will read them.

[Mr. DILLINGHAM handed the volume of hearings to Mr. NORRIS.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in order that the Senate may have the benefit of it—I have not read this yet—I will read it. This is Mr. Darlington's statement:

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Washington Gas Light Co. we would like to submit some considerations in respect to section 6 of the act.

That is the one that the Senate committee strikes out.

That provides that no part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used for payment to the Washington Gas Light Co. or Georgetown Gas Light Co. for any gas furnished by them for the use of the public buildings of the United States or the District of Columbia at a rate in excess of 70 cents per thousand cubic feet.

We have three objections to that section. The first is that the Public Utilities Commission act reposes in that commission the power and duty of fixing uniform rates, and we would think it ought to be left to that commission to do that.

I am going to take up that objection. Mr. President, when this provision was first put in the law the public-utilities act had been passed and was then in existence. Let me call the attention of the Senate to another fact—that in all human probability, if the Public Utilities Commission ever lowers the rate the gas company will be permitted to charge, the first thing that will happen will be an injunction. The next will be a weary road to travel through the courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, so that it probably will be years before the rates that the commission may fix will be put into effect. The representatives of this company appear before the committee and object to this rate because they say that the Public Utilities Commission had jurisdiction. I wonder if they will agree that they will abide by what the Public Utilities Commission do, if they ever do anything?

Every Senator knows that when they do fix a rate, the same with everything else they have fixed so far, the first thing they are met with is a contention in court that what they do is illegal. When Congress undertakes to do it then they come before the committee, as this gentleman did here, and say, "You must not do anything, but the Public Utilities Commission must." I think that is an answer to the first proposition.

It might be said further that nobody can question the right of Congress to fix the rate. Congress fixed that rate after the public-utilities law had been enacted and while the Public Utilities Commissioners were in office. The public-utilities bill, I think, was passed some four years ago. If this goes on, if this rate is not fixed by law, and then they would charge a dollar, and the Public Utilities Commission would undertake to stop it, it would take at least three or four years before you would get it through the courts, and you would have the public-utilities work upheld, even if it was upheld, at the end of a weary lawsuit.

Now, take the next objection, and I am taking them up without having read them before. I have not read this one yet:

In the second place, the same public-utilities act in paragraph 81 makes it a misdemeanor for the officers of these companies to furnish any person, firm, or corporation gas at a greater or less compensation than others. So it creates a question whether this would not lower the rate to everybody to 70 cents per thousand cubic feet.

I wish to heaven it would! It ought; and then what ought we to do? We ought to fix the price not only for the Government but for everybody.

Now, take it as a legal proposition. This man, as the Senator said, is an eminent lawyer. It seems to me he must know, being an eminent lawyer, as he is, that what he contends for here is not law. The same legislative body that provided for the Public Utilities Commission can provide the rate if it so desires. A rate has been fixed by law for years across Rock Creek, where the Georgetown Gas Co. operates. There is a rate of $1 fixed there now by law. On this side of the creek, where the Washington Gas Light Co. operate exclusively and have a monopoly of the gas business, the rate is fixed by law at 85 cents, with a penalty in each case if it is not paid promptly.

So there can be nothing, as a matter of law, in the contention that Congress fixed the rate for private individuals, that passed the law in regard to the Public Utilities Commission, has not the same right to fix a rate for the Government. And, Mr. President, it is not unfair that the Government should get it at a less rate than private individuals, because, being a large consumer, paying all at one time and on one bill, it makes a great deal less work, a great deal less expense than it would to collect the same amount of money from four or five hundred different customers. Now, let us take the third objection:

In the third place, this identical provision, or one to the same effect, was passed by the House in connection with the legislative bill, was considered by the Senate committee, and the commissioners were interrogated about it. I read from page 10 of the hearing on the legislative bill:

"Senator OVERMAN. How are you getting on with the gas company? Have you reached a conclusion?"

"Commissioner KUTZ. No, sir; but we expect to reach a finding as to valuation within three months, and by the 1st of July we anticipate that we will be able to present the valuation of our experts to the companies for a hearing, to determine the 'fair value' of the property of the companies."

"Senator SMOOT. Let me ask you if this provision in the House bill—"

"That is, the one fixing it at 70 cents for public buildings—"

"In any way conflicts with the public-utilities law passed by Congress? Does it conflict with paragraphs 81 and 38 and 41?"

Those are the ones that make it a misdemeanor to make any discrimination to any person in the price of gas.

"Commissioner KUTZ. In a sense it does, in that it apparently takes away from the utilities commission a power that Congress has lodged in that commission; and I feel that the commission's hands would be tied with respect to that kind of service if, subsequent to the passage of the law, Congress fixed a price for a particular use."

"Senator SMOOT. That is what I wanted to know of you."

"Senator OVERMAN. Your idea is that it would be better to wait and let the Public Utilities Commission fix it?"

"Commissioner KUTZ. Yes, sir; that it would be very much better to wait."

Without reading further, the Senate committee sustained that view, the provision was stricken out of the House bill, and the conferees acceded to it. This is a proposition to reintroduce it, not only as to the District but in other acts in which it has been expressly excluded. On those three grounds we think this particular section ought to be eliminated from the bill.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. Has there been any investigation by the Public Utilities Commission to ascertain what is a fair price?

Mr. DARLINGTON. It is stated here that by the 1st of July they will have completed their investigation.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. They are investigating now, as I understand.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. REESIDE. Senator, I think their investigation is about completed. They expect to finish it in a few days. They have been working on it for a year or more, and it is about completed.

Mr. DARLINGTON. That, I think, is all I care to say.

Senator GALLINGER. After what time, if that finding is accepted and litigation does not ensue, the Public Utilities Commission will proceed upon that basis to determine what a fair rate is.

Mr. REESIDE. To fix the rate.

Mr. DARLINGTON. And even if litigation does ensue the Public Utilities Commission act provides that the rate fixed by the commission shall be in force until the court disturbs it.

Mr. President, as I said a while ago, if we have no rate fixed by law, the first thing that will probably happen when the Public Utilities Commission get through and are ready to put a valuation upon the gas company's property will be an injunction. These same attorneys who are here questioning the jurisdiction of Congress will be there questioning the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission, and there will be litigation, hearings will be had, in order to take time, and in the meantime there is no rate fixed by law, and the gas company will be charging what in their judgment is proper.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call your attention to the report of the gas company.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I think this is a matter that needs to be very thoroughly considered. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	James	Overman	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Jones	Penrose	Smoot
Clapp	Kenyon	Polindexter	Swanson

Husting	Norris	Smith, Ga.	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while all the Senators are here I want to say that if this amendment to strike out this provision relating to public buildings on the part of the committee, without the insertion of anything, is defeated, I intend then to offer an amendment applying to the Washington Gas Light Co. that will fix a rate of 75 cents to everybody, private consumers as well as to the Government. So what I am saying now on this amendment against the committee's amendment to strike out what is now in the bill I desire Senators to consider in connection with the other amendment that I shall offer; and I shall not take up the time of the Senate then to debate it, but what I shall say on one amendment applies to the other as well. I want really to take them both up at once; and, Mr. President, I want to be brief, and I am going to be as brief as I can.

I do not believe that we ought to legislate on this subject if there is any question of doubt about doing injury to this company. The figures that I shall give you are based entirely and without exception—if there is an exception I will note it when I give it to you—upon the gas company's reports. So I am taking their own figures. I am drawing mathematical deductions from their own official statements. They have to report to Congress every year, and it is from those reports that I will deduce the proposition that I think will convince any man who will fairly consider it that a reduction from 85 cents the Washington Gas Co. are allowed to charge now to 75 cents would still leave them an income of more than 15 per cent on their entire capital stock, practically one-half of which is pure water.

This gas company was organized in 1848, and it has paid dividends all the way from 10 per cent on its capital stock to 65 per cent. In the RECORD of March 13, 1914, if Senators care to look into it, will be found in detail a history of the development of this company.

I am not going back so far, because I do not want to take the time now to give all the dividends that have been declared. I do not believe, however, that they ever fell below 10 per cent. The extensions that have been made mostly and improvements as the gas system developed from that of a comparatively small city to the present city of Washington were made almost exclusively out of the income from the sale of gas. So the extension was mainly paid for by the men who bought the gas, and all the time dividends of at least 10 per cent were paid, and in one year as high as 65 per cent; in another year, in reality, making a present to every stockholder in cash of the amount of the par value of the stock which he held.

Going back as far as 1870, it was 10 per cent; in 1871 it was 15 per cent; in 1872 it was 15 per cent; in 1873 it was 15 per cent; in 1874 it was 55 per cent; in 1875 it was 20 per cent; in 1876 it was 65 per cent; in 1877 it was 15 per cent; in 1878 it was 15 per cent; in 1879 it was 15 per cent; in 1880 it was 15 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, an investigation was made of this company several years ago when Senator Spooner was a Member of this body. The older Members of the Senate know him well, and have great regard for him and for his ability. I want to quote him a little. There is a good deal in the RECORD that I have taken from Senator Spooner's report, but I want to read a paragraph in regard to what he said about the watering of the stock:

It is difficult to resist the suspicion arising from an examination of the sums heretofore given as alleged increase of capital from 1872 to 1883, aggregating $800,000, that they represent nothing else than stock dividends, however called, in addition to the large money dividends from time to time declared and paid by the company.

The dividends run on at about that rate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Until when?

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to give it right up until now. The treasurer of the company, in a letter to Senator Spooner and Hon. Samuel J. Randall, February 25, 1881, said:

For the thirty-one and a half years the average of cash and stock dividends has been 16.8 per cent.

I will come on to a later date. I will not give all of them. None go below 10 per cent that I have been able to find.

Mr. TAGGART. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. TAGGART. What control has Congress over this company?

Mr. NORRIS. It has absolute control.

Mr. TAGGART. Has Congress gotten a report from them?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am going to take up their report. These figures I have given are taken from their own report. Whatever right they have they must get from the Congress of the United States.

For the year 1906 they paid a dividend of 10 per cent and set aside a surplus of $170,879.83. They did another thing that year that is peculiar. They had a capital stock at that time of $2,600,000. That is what the capital stock is now. That year, in addition to giving the 10 per cent and the setting aside of this surplus and a large sum for depreciation, taking their own figures, they issued "dividend certificates of indebtedness" to the stockholders for $2,600,000. That was the amount of the capital stock. They gave that to the stockholders without any consideration whatever. They were called "dividend certificates of indebtedness." In other words, every stockholder who had a share of stock, suppose he had $100 worth of stock par value, got a certificate of indebtedness signed by the company to him, drawing 6 per cent interest, for $100. If he had $10,000 of the par value, he got a certificate of indebtedness drawing 6 per cent interest given to him, signed by the officials of the company for $10,000. Then, after that the company proceeded to pay, and did pay, every year 6 per cent on those certificates of indebtedness in addition to their dividends. It was 1906 when that took place.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can the Senator inform the Senate why those certificates were called "certificates of indebtedness"?

Mr. NORRIS. The only reason that I know of is that their dividends were getting too large, and I presume they were desirous of covering them up. Those same certificates—and I will come to that in a moment—to-day constitute a part of the bonded indebtedness of this company; they are paying interest to the bondholders on it; and the men and women who buy gas are footing the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it possible that the Senator from Nebraska means to have it understood that the stockholders did not pay anything for those certificates?

Mr. NORRIS. That is just what I mean to have understood. That was not the only stock dividend which this company issued; in other words, it resulted in giving a 100 per cent dividend, although the debt is still standing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was covered by making it stand as an indebtedness against the company?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. That was in 1906. Now, just follow it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not like to dwell upon this matter; it is rather painful to contemplate; but, if I understand the Senator, that practically doubled the capitalization of this gas company, without those who got the stock putting any money in for the stock?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, that is a very sad record to contemplate, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, that so-called indebtedness, that gratuity to the stockholders, is made the basis of raising the rate still higher upon the consuming public?

Mr. NORRIS. Surely. It is now a part of the indebtedness of this company.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know the Senator from Nebraska has given a good deal of study to the history and the financial operations of this particular corporation. Did I understand the Senator to say, in answer to a question propounded by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TAGGART], that Congress has full authority and supervision over the corporation?

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I said; yes, sir; that is my idea. I do not believe anybody doubts that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did not Congress interpose to prevent the public being saddled with this doubling of the capitalization as a mere fictitious performance on the part of this company?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I do not know what happened at that time. There might have been something said in the newspapers; but I am not sure even as to that. No action, however, was taken, and no impediment was put in the way of the company doing this thing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can it be possible that attention of Congress was ever called to this extraordinary performance?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this is the second time that I have called the attention of Congress to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And on the former occasion, when it was spread upon the records of the Senate here, was no action taken to reduce the rate for gas to the general consuming public?

Mr. NORRIS. On the former occasion when this matter was brought up the amendment which was offered reducing the rate to all the consumers of the product of the Washington Gas Light Co. to 75 cents per thousand feet went out on a point of order. Then an amendment was offered and adopted putting a limitation on the appropriation. That was the result of that discussion, and the measure then passed has been the law ever since. That is what the committee now seeks by their amendment to strike out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, the Senator, as a result of the exposure which he made at that time, succeeded in getting a reduction of gas rates to the Government as a consumer in a limited way? Is that what I understand?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is practically what happened.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A reduction in the rate to the District of Columbia?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is practically what happened.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Senator was not able, because some one on the floor made a point of order against his amendment, to extend that saving to the general consuming public?

Mr. NORRIS. The point of order was made against the amendment, and it went out on that ground.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Senator had informed the Senate of this doubling of the capitalization under the guise of certificates of indebtedness at that time?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and that has never been denied.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is most remarkable.

Mr. NORRIS. In 1907, Mr. President, the next year after the certificates of indebtedness were issued, those certificates drew 6 per cent. They were given to the stockholders; and a dividend of 10 per cent was declared, making a dividend altogether of 16 per cent on their capital stock. In 1908 the same thing occurred; there was a 16 per cent dividend. In 1909 the dividend was again 16 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Nebraska excuse an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator again state in what year those certificates were issued?

Mr. NORRIS. They were issued in 1906.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was a Member of the Senate at that time. He seems to be horrified, but he was then here.

Mr. NORRIS. In 1911 these certificates of indebtedness were taken up by the company, and the men who held them were paid 100 cents on the dollar in addition to 6 per cent interest that they had been receiving all the time. To get the money to pay that 100 cents on the dollar, the company issued bonds, that are still outstanding, and which are an indebtedness against the company in the amount of $2,600,000; and they turned the money over to the holders of the stock. Besides that, they paid a dividend of 13½ per cent. So in reality the holders of that stock got that year a dividend of 113½ per cent. Those bonds are still outstanding.

In 1912 the company, instead of paying interest of 6 per cent on the stock dividends, had to pay the interest on the bonds which were issued, instead of the stock dividends, the proceeds of which were paid in cash to the holders of the stock. I wish Senators would listen to this. After doing that in 1912, they paid a dividend of 24 per cent. That is taking their own figures, taking their own books, without questioning any statement as to the salaries which they paid their officers or what they paid here or what they paid there—taking their own word for it, they still paid 24 per cent. They set aside—and I am not complaining because they set aside—every one of those years a large sum of money for depreciation, so that they would be on the safe side. I have not been reading that statement as to these various years; but for all these years they have always done that, and they have always made extensions, which they took out of the money that the consumers of gas paid, without issuing stock or bonds for it.

In the year 1912 it might be interesting—taking it as a sample, and I only take it as an illustration; I do not know whether it would be more or less than the year preceding or the year following—to note that they set aside for depreciation over $64,000. After doing that they paid 24 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the next year—1913. Taking their own figures, taking everything just as they report it, they made extensions during that year amounting to $161,000 out of their income; they set aside $77,000 for depreciation; and, after doing all that, they paid a dividend of 24 per cent on the capital stock, practically one-half of which was water.

Mr. President, any Senator can deduce the facts I have brought out from the figures contained in the report of the Washington Gas Light Co. ending December 31, 1915. I have that report and their reports for a number of previous years. In 1914 they paid a dividend of 24 per cent, and in 1915—that is, last year—they paid a dividend of 24 per cent. I have taken their figures and deduced what dividends they would have been able to pay if they had charged only 75 cents for gas, the price I shall propose in an amendment which I desire to offer, if the Senate votes down the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. I want to offer that amendment, and it will now be in order because the House has legislated on the subject, to reduce the price which this company can charge for gas—and it does not apply to the Georgetown company—to 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet. If that had been the law last year, taking their own figures, setting aside everything they set aside for depreciation and paying for extensions and salaries and including every other charge they have included—if they had only received 75 cents per thousand feet, which, as I have said, is the price contained in the amendment I intend to offer, they would still have been able to declare a dividend of 15½ per cent. Now I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is going back to the original capitalization of this company and basing all his figures upon that. Is it not a fact that one-half of the stockholders of this company to-day are women, most of whom paid for their stock a consideration under which they receive only from 5 to 6 per cent on their investment? Is it fair for the Senator to go back 50 years, more or less, and upon the capitalization of the company at that time base his figures as to dividends? The Senator says that the company paid a dividend of 24 per cent last year. I chance to know a good many people who own that stock, and they do not get 6 per cent on what it cost them.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean to say that I have made a misstatement? I have the figures here.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has made a statement that creates a wrong impression.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that I am not creating a wrong impression.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator certainly is.

Mr. NORRIS. I have taken the figures which the gas company gives. If they were my figures, then, of course, the Senator would question them and look at them with suspicion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not question them unless the facts warranted it.

Mr. NORRIS. But I have taken the figures of the gas company itself, and I will show from their own figures that they paid 24 per cent dividends.

Mr. GALLINGER. The figures do not show that they have paid that to the present stockholders of the company.

Mr. NORRIS. They can not pay it to any other stockholders.

Mr. GALLINGER. They certainly did not pay it to the present stockholders. They may have paid that on the basis of the original capitalization of the company, but not on what the stock cost the present holders of it.

Mr. NORRIS. They pay it on the basis of the capital stock of $2,600,000. That is their capital stock, and one-half of that is water. I know what the Senator is thinking about. He realizes that this gas stock is at a very high premium. It can not be bought at par. It has been paying such enormous dividends that the stock has gone away up in the market. I think the par value of the capital stock per share is $25—from $20 to $25.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the original shares; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The par value is just the same to-day as it was five years ago. The capital stock has remained at $2,600,000 for quite a number of years; it has not been increased; and when it was increased it was simply increased by putting more water in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I think I see the difficulty the Senator is laboring under, and I think it is a difficulty, namely, that because the stock has gone up so high in the market that when somebody buys a $25 share he has to pay in round numbers pretty nearly a hundred dollars to get it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is quoted at about $75 at the present time.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, he has to pay $75, which is three times its par value. It has gone up to that figure because the company has been paying 24 per cent interest on par value, and other things besides.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the fact—

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment, if he will excuse me. Shall we say now because some widow has invested her money or some man or anybody else has invested money in this stock, paying $75 a share when the par value of it is $25, that Congress shall permit this company to continue to get an income on the par value of its stock of 24 per cent in order that the investor in the stock may not lose any money? Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it is not quite the Senator's idea. My idea is that the original stockholders have probably all disappeared, and that this stock is held in the hands of thousands of comparatively poor people. If the Senator should go and buy a share of gas stock at the present time, how much dividend would the Senator expect to get from it?

Mr. NORRIS. I would have received this year 24 per cent on every share of stock which I had.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator bought a share last year?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is what I would have received.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Senator from Nebraska is not wrong.

Mr. GALLINGER. He must be.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire is thinking about what I would have to pay to get the stock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly the dividend would be based on the cost of the stock.

Mr. NORRIS. I would have to pay a good deal more than the par value, and on my investment I would not have made 24 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. No. What would the Senator have made?

Mr. NORRIS. I would have made, depending on what I had to pay, probably about 6 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Five or six per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I do not care if it were only 3 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, is the Senator, because this company 50 years ago, or perhaps 25 years ago, did something that was not right, going to penalize all the present holders of this stock, many of whom paid three times the par value?

Mr. NORRIS. I will confine it to last year. For the year ending the 31st day of December last they showed a dividend of 24 per cent. Is that fair to the men and women who have to buy the gas and pay a price that will provide the money for such a dividend?

Mr. GALLINGER. They showed that dividend on the original capitalization.

Mr. NORRIS. That is on their capital stock.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator went out on the market to-day and bought the stock himself he would not get more than 5 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. I would get a return depending on my investment, on the amount I had to pay for the stock; but I would get 24 per cent on the par value of the stock. Who gave that value to the stock? It was the people who paid for the gas; and we have been recreant in permitting the company to charge a rate that was so outrageous that the gas company could make that amount of money.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator without doubt would have received 24 per cent if he had bought the stock 30 or 40 years ago and held it, but that stock has passed into the hands of innocent purchasers, most of whom are getting but 5 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. If 25 years ago I had bought $10,000 worth of the stock, I would have had twice as much stock now, because of the water that has been injected into it, and I would have been getting 24 per cent on that.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. President, if the theory of the Senator from New Hampshire is right, then, because we have permitted the gas company to charge an exorbitant rate and make an exorbitant profit, and somebody else has bought the stock, we must keep on doing that forever. There is no place to stop it. In other words, he would go on this principle: If I charge the Senator from Oregon here an outrageous price for something, and make him pay it right along and get him where he is helpless, and has to pay me a 25 per cent dividend on my money, I can say, "He has been paying that for 10 years. It has become valuable now. Because it is valuable we will make him and his posterity pay it forever." There never would be any way to get relief—no way on earth.

The Senator from New Hampshire speaks of poor people owning the stock. I do not know. The names are here. The names are in the report, and the number of shares they have are all here in the report. I do not know whether they are poor or rich. This legislation does not depend on that. According to my theory, according to my belief, it ought not to make a particle of difference whether they are millionaires or whether they are just ordinary people like me. They ought not to be permitted to use the streets of the Capital City and charge the consumers of gas a rate that will enable them to pay 24 per cent on capital stock, half of which is water.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I asked the Senator last year what they were paying for gas in the towns and cities of Nebraska. Can he give the answer?

Mr. NORRIS. No; but I remember that in my town, when Congress adjourned long enough to give me a chance to go home, I had to pay a dollar; and out where I live now I have to pay a dollar to this company, the Washington Gas Co., because I live out in the country. I had to go out there to get away from such things as this, but I got into a bigger one. I have to pay a dollar out there.

Now, let me ask the Senator a question. Does he think that if it is shown here that this gas company is making a profit of 24 per cent, really 48 per cent, on its investment, we ought to make the poor people here pay it, just because the people in my town have to pay a dollar for gas?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not agree to that proposition at all. Now, Omaha is the great city of Nebraska. The gas company of Omaha charges the people $1.25 for gas, or $1.15 net. They get it here for 85 cents in most of the city; and yet the Senator is arraigning Washington as being robbed by a gas company.

Mr. NORRIS. And Washington is being robbed by a gas company.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the Senator's opinion. If so, Omaha is robbing its people twice as badly.

Mr. NORRIS. Not necessarily. It may be doing so. I am not saying whether it is or is not; but that has not any more to do with this proposition than the flowers that bloom in the springtime.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps not. "Charity begins at home" usually, and fair play should also begin at home.

Mr. NORRIS. Then charity ought to begin with the Senator from New Hampshire. He has been chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia for 12 years, "sleeping at the switch."

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. While the people of this town were paying exorbitant prices for gas.

Mr. GALLINGER. During that time the price of gas in the District of Columbia has been reduced from $1.25 to 85 cents. The Senator from New Hampshire has not been "sleeping at the switch."

Mr. NORRIS. If he had not been "sleeping at the switch," if he had been doing his duty—

Mr. GALLINGER. He has been doing his duty.

Mr. NORRIS. If he had been doing his duty the people of Washington to-day would be getting gas for 70 cents, and the gas company would be making 15 per cent profit then.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps they would be getting it for nothing if the Senator from Nebraska had his way. The Senator from Nebraska must not say that the Senator from New Hampshire has been neglecting his duty, because he has not.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, that we will have to take without showing.

Mr. GALLINGER. The facts prove it.

Mr. NORRIS. We will not need to prove that he has not neglected his duty, because he admits it.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; he does not admit it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then does the Senator mean to say that he has not done his duty?

Mr. GALLINGER. I say, the Senator does not admit that he neglected his duty, and the Senator from Nebraska must not put that in my mouth.

Mr. NORRIS. I said that the Senator admitted that he had done his duty, and the Senator then replied that he did not admit it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, that is better, if the Senator puts it that way; I did not understand him. Now, the Senator has called attention to a remarkable circumstance that occurred in 1906, and the Senator from Wisconsin in holy horror says: "That is an awful thing!" Yet the Senator from Wisconsin was a Member of this body when that occurred.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from New Hampshire think that he was disgraced because he was a Member of this body when that occurred?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think he ought to have looked after this "awful" matter.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire was also a Member of this body at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. So I was.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator from New Hampshire was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia at that very time, having jurisdiction over those things.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I was not chairman.

Mr. NORRIS. Was not the Senator chairman then?

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly I was; but no matter about that.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator was.

Mr. GALLINGER. No matter about that now. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I prepared and reported a bill, and it has been enacted into law, creating a Public Utilities Commission, which has absolute jurisdiction over this matter. Now, is not the Senator willing to leave it in the hands of that commission?

Mr. NORRIS. No. Where I can see something that ought to be righted and ought to be righted now, I am in favor of righting it now. Does the Senator deny that the gas company has paid 24 per cent for years and years that are past? Does the Senator deny that half of their capital stock is water, and does he assert that 24 per cent is a reasonable rate to permit a public utility corporation to get?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not deny or affirm anything about it further than I have already denied half a dozen times. I take exception to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that the company is paying its present stockholders 24 per cent, and the Senator knows that. Senator Spooner made an exhaustive investigation of that matter, and Senator Spooner did not offer any remedy for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator from New Hampshire going to blame me for that?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but the Senator from Nebraska quoted Senator Spooner.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator had better read Senator Spooner's report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, I have read it over and over again.

Mr. NORRIS. I have read it, and if the Senator will read it again he will find that Senator Spooner made an arraignment of that company that I presume made the Senator blush.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, well, I do not know about that. There are some men in public life who are always arraigning some corporation or other.

Mr. NORRIS. And there are certain others who are always defending corporations under all circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so, when they think they are right. Has the Senator read the testimony given before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill on this subject a few weeks ago?

Mr. NORRIS. I read something here in the Senate a while ago. That is what I have read.

Mr. GALLINGER. From those hearings?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether they were from those hearings or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I am not going to discuss this matter any further. I am willing to let the matter go for what it is worth and let the Senate reduce the price of gas in the District of Columbia all it wants to. It will not affect me one way or the other—certainly not many cents. But I do say that after we have created a Public Utilities Commission that is to-day making a valuation of this property, upon which valuation it will fix rates, it is not the place of the Senate to interfere with this matter before that commission has performed its duty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all I have to say about it just now.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will not object to my saying something?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I do not felicitate myself on anything of that kind.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is true we have a Public Utilities Commission. I have a good deal of faith in it; but it has been at work for four years, and probably more. It has been at work at least that long, and it has not reached this proposition yet. As I have said, I do not want to injure this gas company in any way, and if I thought that fixing a price might cut down its income beyond a reasonable amount I would not advocate doing so. But just as surely as you permit this Senate committee amendment to go through and repeal the law that limits the amount they can charge, and the Public Utilities Commission get ready to do business—and they are approaching that time now—just that soon you will find them in court, and it will be perhaps four years before they get through or maybe longer; and men who are here to-day will be dead, many of them, before they reach the end of that litigation, and still they will go on charging the people of this city 24 per cent on stock that is half water and half money.

Why, the Senator from New Hampshire seems to feel that because some people who are innocent of things that happened in the past now own the stock of the company, and because they are poor therefore we ought to permit this thing to go on without end. He forgets that everyone who purchased that stock did it openly, knowing what he was paying for and what the par value was, and that the poor people at the other end of the string that we were imposing on, who could not help themselves, have had to buy the gas. This company has had a monopoly on the manufacture and sale of gas. There was no competition in these homes, and, on the other hand, there are thousands and thousands of ordinarily poor people all over this city cooking with gas the year around, lighting their homes with gas, and they are helpless. They can not help themselves. They pay what Congress says shall be the rate, and Congress is responsible for imposing upon every one of those poor people. On the other hand, those who bought the stock did it with their eyes open, did it publicly, did it without coercion, and perhaps on an investigation it will be found that they are not such awfully poor people after all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just one more question—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have an Interstate Commerce Commission that has charge of railroad matters. That commission is having the railroads of the country valued for the purpose of fixing rates. Under those circumstances the Senator would not want Congress to interfere and say that the rates for mileage on the railroads of Nebraska or anywhere else should be 1½ or 2 cents while that commission is making an investigation of it, would he?

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, we have a Public Utilities Commission in this city that are making a valuation of all the utilities of the city; and they are doing it, so they say, for the purpose of fixing rates. Does the Senator think it is any more fair for Congress to step in here, pending that investigation, and declare what the rates shall be, than it would be if we interfered with railroad rates?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President; and I will tell the Senator why. I would not vote for a law fixing railroad rates now unless I had the evidence upon which to base it. I have the evidence here in the case of the gas company, and it is the evidence taken from the enemy. I have no doubt but that the real truth of the matter would cut down these expenses. I am taking their own report. I am taking their own statement. I am taking at 100 cents on the dollar just what they say; and I say, "If that is true, now—if these things are true—then you have paid 24 per cent dividends." They say, "Yes; we have." I will take the same amount of gas—and everybody knows it will be more; I have the figures right here—taking the same amount of gas that they sold, and figuring it up, which you can easily do—it is only a question of a few minutes—at 75 cents per thousand, you can see how much of a dividend they would have declared. It would have been 15½ per cent, and a little more.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not to the present stockholders.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; of course it is to the present stockholders. Of course it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I give it up.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator had better give it up.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I give it up.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator ought to have given it up long ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; the Senator is not justified in saying that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am justified in saying that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is not.

Mr. NORRIS. I am justified. I have said it and I am responsible for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is responsible for it, and I am glad that the responsibility rests with the Senator. What I meant was that I can not follow his reasoning, and hence I have given it up. I have not enough intellect to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not to blame because the Senator's intellect is defective. That is not my fault.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not; but the Senator is to blame for making misstatements and expecting anybody's intellect to follow him.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not made any misstatement, and I challenge the Senator right now to point to a single statement that is not borne out by the gas company's own report. I challenge him to put his finger on any one of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I say I do not propose to pursue the matter any further.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, of course. The Senator can not do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes; I can.

Mr. NORRIS. I deny it, and I challenge him or anybody else—

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, we have had this annual harangue from the Senator, and I suppose we will have to submit to it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know how the Senator can escape from it. He can not escape from it in any way that I know of. But, Mr. President, when the Senator says I have made misstatements, I challenge his statement and I say that it is not true. I have the statement here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I say that when the Senator from Nebraska asserts that this company is paying from 14 to 24 per cent, he does not convey the right impression so far as the present stockholders of the company are concerned. It is his statements that are untrue.

Mr. NORRIS. That is an entirely different statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it is the very statement I have made all along.

Mr. NORRIS. I will accept that statement, and I am going to analyze it. When I say you are paying 24 per cent on the capital stock of the company, I say something that any man of ordinary intelligence will understand; and if the stockholders of this company do not understand that, they do not possess the intelligence of the ordinary individual. They get 24 per cent on the capital stock of the company. They have been getting it for years.

Mr. NELSON. On its par value.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. On its par value, of course. That is what the capital stock is. Now, when to get that stock you have to pay a high premium, of course on the money that you invested, if you bought that stock to-day, you would not get 24 per cent; and that is the very reason why the Senator does not want to reduce the rate. In effect, his argument means that we have done wrong in the past. We have permitted this company to build itself up on water and charge these people an unconscionable amount for what they have been getting, and now innocent stockholders have gotten hold of the stock, and we must permit it to go on forever.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota. Then I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand the position of the Senator from New Hampshire, who was the chairman of this committee for a long time, it is this: The Senator from Nebraska is right, of course, in his statement that $2,300,000 worth of stock has been issued. The par value of that stock is $25 per share; but if this stock has been resold at 300 per cent premium, then I believe the Senator from Nebraska is mistaken in assuming that the stockholders are receiving 24 per cent. As a matter of fact, they are receiving 8 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. They are receiving 24 per cent on the par value of their stock. The book value, as given by the company, is $13,268,020.11. Now, the par value amount of paid-up capital stock is $2,600,000. That very fact demonstrates that they are charging too much for gas, because on that capital stock, as I said, half of which is water, they have been able to pay such a dividend that the book value of their stock is over $13,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the investigation now going on puts it at $9,000,000 or thereabouts. I pass over the Senator's slur about my intellect.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the physical value of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one further observation and I am through, because I do not want to continue a wordy or acrimonious encounter with the Senator from Nebraska. I have no desire to do so.

It seems to me that it is utterly unfair to go back and say that because the stock was issued for $25 a share 40 or 50 or 60 years ago the present rate of dividends should be based upon that capitalization. It creates, to my mind, a wrong impression in the minds of those who are listening to the Senator, and that is the only issue I will make with the Senator.

The Senator says that I am defending this corporation. I am not. I never received a favor from it in my life. I pay my gas bills as others do. They are a little smaller than they are in my home town, because the rate is lower here than there. I have never meant to defend this gas company in anything it has done that was wrong. The position I take to-day is this: This matter is in the hands of a Public Utilities Commission. It is a commission that is not very favorable to corporations, as I chance to know. They are now making their valuations. According to the testimony given before the legislative, executive, and judicial subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, they are nearly through with that, and they propose now to fix rates on that valuation. Now, I am willing to accept those rates, whatever they make them. I do not care whether the rate is 70 cents or 50 cents. But I say, pending the work of this commission that we created, that exists by law, and that has the duty to perform which was imposed on it, we ought not to discuss this matter in the Senate.

That is the position I take; and I want the Senator to understand my position, because I shall be glad to get gas cheaper than 85 cents in Washington if the commission so orders it. I pay gas bills as well as the Senator, but I do not want to do anything that would interfere with the work that is now going on by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see that this does interfere with it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was interested to know how widely distributed this stock is. Approximately how many stockholders are there?

Mr. NORRIS. I can give that from the report here. The total number of stockholders is 1,469.

Mr. President, I have but a few words more to say. If the Senator from New Hampshire has the correct idea and the Public Utilities Commission take his idea they will not cut down the rate; they will probably increase it. They will say these widows and orphans who have been the innocent purchasers of this stock and this water are entitled to little larger dividends on their investment, and therefore the rate must be increased; and the other poor people, widows and orphans who are helpless and can not get away from the gas company, will pay the rate. If the Senator's theory is right, that the book value—in fact, the value that is made by the price that is paid by the consumer—is the value upon which we should base our premiums and get a fair rate on that, then we will never reduce anything anywhere, because whenever you get a rate that is not large enough you will increase the consumer's rate so that the dividend may be higher; and when you get it higher and the stock goes up then the investor who gets the stock will have to have his dividend, and you will have to increase it again, and the consumers at the other end will always be footing the bill.

There is another thing that the Senator from New Hampshire has mentioned several times. He says that in Omaha they are paying a dollar and a quarter for gas and in other towns of Nebraska they are paying more. I answered that by saying it did not have anything to do with the proposition here. The gas company here used to charge a dollar, in fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they charged $8 at one time.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably. If the cost of producing the gas here was such that they could not make fair dividends on 85 cents, I would be willing to permit them to charge more, to charge enough to make a dividend; but we can not compare what it costs in the far West, where everything is more expensive, and particularly coal, out of which a good deal of the gas is made. Coal is three times higher there than it is here right at the mouth of the coal mines. Even if the people of Omaha are being robbed, why should the citizens of Washington be robbed? On the other hand, the same argument would go in Omaha, I suppose, and if they would want to defend the rate there they would say in Washington, the Capital City, they permit the gas company to charge a rate that will bring an income of 24 per cent, and therefore we in Omaha ought to have 24 or 25 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. When the inquiry was made before the Committee on Appropriations in the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and this same subject was up, the following colloquy occurred:

Senator OVERMAN—

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that he was not probably in, but I read all that.

Mr. GALLINGER. You have read all this?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I read all of it this afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did you read the answer of the commissioners?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I read the answer of the commissioners.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right. I will ask the Senator one other question. Does the Senator seriously think that the Government and the District of Columbia ought to get gas cheaper than the private consumer?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think it ought to get it a little cheaper, and I gave my reason for that. I think it ought to do that because it is less expensive to collect from one consumer like the Government than it would be to collect from four or five hundred people the same amount. I do not think there is anything wrong in giving the Government a better rate of 5 or 10 cents. But if the amendment I proposed should be enacted that will not be the case; the Government will be treated just the same as everybody else. As the law is now, the Government gets the best of it. But that was not my fault, that was not the kind of amendment I wanted to get; it was because of the opposition of men like the Senator from New Hampshire that I was unable to get an amendment that gave the same reduction to the people of the city of Washington.

In other words, Mr. President, here is a public utility corporation dependent for its charter upon Congress, Congress having given it a monopoly of the business and donated the streets of the Capital City to it and given it the only authority that exists in the city of Washington this side of Rock Creek to manufacture and sell gas and conduct it over the streets.

That makes it peculiarly responsible and we are responsible to every consumer of gas in the city of Washington. I appeal to the Senator that while you are thinking about the widows and orphans to think about the thousands and thousands of poor people in this city who depend upon our action and who must pay the amount for gas that we provide by law. Remember, if we repeal the law that now stands and let the corporation get into the courts we will perhaps all be dead before, through the Public Utilities Commission, the people can get relief. Then remember that, based upon their own report of the last year, if this amendment that I am going to propose, if the Senate committee amendment is defeated, were the law they would still have made the last year 15½ per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not help asking the Senator one more question.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. GALLINGER. How large a proportion of those fourteen hundred and odd stockholders will be getting 15½ per cent? Why does the Senator insist upon that?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator and myself can never agree on that. I say they will all get 15½ per cent. The Senator can not get away from the fact that perhaps some of those people—I do not care if all of them—bought this stock and paid a high premium for it, and then to figure the money on their investment as compared with the poor people of Washington who can not get away from this monopoly and who have to buy their gas from this company, and who, on the other hand, you compel to pay exorbitant prices in order that these people who with their eyes open made this investment might get a sufficient return on the investment.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the first place, I do not think they are paying an exorbitant price. I am paying $1.15 in my home town.

Mr. NORRIS. They are paying a price that enables this company to reap a dividend of 24 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I wish to ask the Senator a question. The Senator said there would be an injunction if the Utilities Commission could fix the price. Is it not a fact that whatever price they might fix would stand until the court decided otherwise?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and is it not a fact that every time an injunction comes before the price is fixed?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I ask the question, Would not the price fixed by the Utilities Commission remain until it was decided to the contrary by the court?

Mr. NORRIS. But it would not be fixed. The first thing to happen would be an injunction that would enjoin them from fixing the price. The same lawyer who appeared before the committee and claimed that it had no jurisdiction because the Public Utilities Commission did have jurisdiction will be there contending that the Public Utilities Commission has no jurisdiction, that the law is unconstitutional, and a thousand other reasons.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The Public Utilities Commission might fix the price, and when the price is fixed it is fixed until it is changed by the court.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment I propose will not interfere with that whatever. It specifically provides that it will not interfere with it.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say. The capital stock of this company is $2,600,000 in round numbers, one-half of which is water. The property of the company is worth many thousands of dollars. The great portion of its value has been made out of the income of the property. So notwithstanding all that, notwithstanding the salaries they pay to their officers, notwithstanding all the expenses they put in their own report, according to their own books and according to their own ideas, giving them credit for all of it, deducting nothing; yet they paid last year 24 per cent on their entire capital stock, and they paid 24 per cent the year before, and 24 per cent the year before that, and so on back. They have not paid less than 10 per cent for more than 50 years, and they have paid as high as 65 per cent, and at one time they doubled the capital stock.

Now, Mr. President, that being true, and we being responsible for their very existence in the city, using the public streets of the Capital City, should we now permit them to charge a rate that will enable them to make a dividend of 24 per cent on that kind of capital and on all that water and make the poor people of Washington pay it? Will it be any defense that the people in Omaha had to pay a dollar? Will it be any defense that the people in New York had to pay $2 or $3 or $5? In other words, if we are arrested for stealing, will it be any defense to offer in evidence that some other fellow stole in some other place and was kept out of jail?

It seems to me that we ought to vote down the committee amendment, and then I will offer my amendment, and I hope the Senate will agree to it. The amendment I will offer will not apply to the Georgetown Gas Light Co., that has jurisdiction on the other side of Rock Creek. I have not gone into their affairs. I do not feel warranted in making the same provision for them that I propose for this company; and I am relieved from any personal charge of any kind that might possibly be made by anybody when I state that I live on the other side of Rock Creek and I buy my gas from the Georgetown Gas Co., and I pay a dollar for it. The amendment I propose only applies to the Washington Gas Light Co., that has a monopoly and furnishes gas to the entire District on this side of Rock Creek. Of course, that includes practically all of the city and all the public buildings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). The question is on concurring in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, before this matter is determined I wish to state what moved the committee to act as they did in this matter. We felt, Mr. President, that we did not know what gas should be sold for in the District of Columbia and the city of Washington. So far as I am concerned I have no knowledge of the cost of the production of gas. It was not only before our committee in the consideration of this bill, but the committee in the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill considered the same question. When it came before the committee at that time the members of the Utilities Commission appeared, and they said they were taking an inventory, a valuation, of the physical value of the gas company; that they were about through with that valuation; that probably the experts would be through by the 1st of July, and then they would proceed to get the various information necessary to come to a conclusion as to what gas should be worth.

Mr. President, this Utilities Commission has been appointed for the purpose of determining the price that the people should pay for gas, but there is a Utilities Commission appointed for that purpose; they have every means in their possession for determining what is right between the utility corporations and the people, and we felt that it was not our duty to determine what gas should be sold for in the District of Columbia until that valuation should be made.

In fact, so far as I am concerned, I do not feel that it is incumbent upon me to determine what the value of gas is in this city, but there is a Utilities Commission appointed for that purpose with all the authority needed to get all the information that is possible upon the subject and to determine it. We felt that for the present it was better to leave it until they had an opportunity to determine it, to put it over until they would be in a position to determine what should be charged. That is the reason which moved your committee to determine as it did to leave it over until the Public Utilities Commission could determine it for themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 119 it is proposed to strike out section 6 and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Sec. 6. On and after the 1st day of October, 1916, the Washington Gas Light Co. shall not charge or collect for gas furnished a consumer in any part of the District of Columbia a rate in excess of 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet of gas so furnished: Provided, That if a consumer of gas other than the Government or the District of Columbia shall not pay monthly any gas bill within 10 days after the same shall have been presented, said gas company may charge and collect from any such consumer so failing to pay said gas bill as aforesaid 10 cents additional for each 1,000 cubic feet of gas represented by said bill: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or taking away any of the powers now vested by law in the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will modify his amendment so as to include the Georgetown Gas Light Co.?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I stated in debating the question—the Senator from Utah was not then in the Chamber—that I have never investigated the reports of the condition and stock of the Georgetown Gas Light Co.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Nebraska does not wish to modify his amendment as I have suggested, I shall not press the request at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I had rather the Senator from Utah should offer his proposition as a separate amendment, if he desires to offer it.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not press it at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] I wish simply to read two or three questions and answers to be found in the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill a short time ago. The Senator from Nebraska stated that he had read those hearings, but I want to read this now. The question was up at that time; that is, there was a provision in that bill substantially the same as the one in the bill which we are now considering, giving gas to the District of Columbia and the Government at a cheaper rate than it is furnished to private parties. Mr. Newman, the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, was giving testimony. He said:

We have been making a very thorough valuation of both gas companies' properties in the District for the last two years and a half—the gas companies and all the utilities. We do that as a Public Utilities Commission, not as District Commissioners. Col. Kutz is chairman of the Public Utilities Commission and, I think, should make the statement about that before the committee.

Senator OVERMAN. How are you getting on with the gas company? Have you reached a conclusion?

Commissioner KUTZ. No, sir; but we expect to reach a finding as to valuation within three months, and by the 1st of July we anticipate that we will be able to present the valuation of our experts to the companies for a hearing, to determine the "fair value" of the property of the companies.

Senator OVERMAN. Your idea is that it would be better to wait and let the Public Utilities Commission fix it?

Commissioner KUTZ. Yes, sir; that it would be very much better to wait.

In answer to another question, Engineer Commissioner Kutz says that it will complicate matters if legislation of this kind is consummated before the Public Utilities Commission has an opportunity to weigh the matter as to the proper price of gas in view of the valuation that will be placed upon the property; and upon that statement the matter was stricken from the bill. I again read from the hearings:

Senator ROBINSON. Has the Public Utilities Commission up to this time fixed any rates for gas?

Commissioner KUTZ. Not for gas. That was the last of the utilities of the District that we took up to value.

Senator ROBINSON. How long since you took that up?

Commissioner KUTZ. We took that up last fall and carried it as far as our funds went, and then we had to stop.

Senator ROBINSON. The matter is still under investigation?

Commissioner KUTZ. We secured an additional appropriation of $16,000 in the deficiency bill, and we have just resumed work on the gas valuation.

Senator ROBINSON. In a general way, what investigations are you making in order to determine that?

Commissioner KUTZ. We are making a complete inventory and value of all their physical property.

Senator ROBINSON. A physical valuation?

Commissioner KUTZ. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And before you fix the price you have to ascertain the cost of the material and labor required to make gas?

Commissioner KUTZ. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The value of the property will be but a beginning?

Commissioner KUTZ. And, then, we are also making an investigation of their books to determine the actual investment made by the company in the property.

Mr. President, I am not going to say many words more about this matter. My position, as a rule, has been misunderstood when I have undertaken to discuss the question because this is a corporation, and corporations are under the ban at the present time.

We created this commission just as we created the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission have jurisdiction over the rates of fare on the railroads of the country. They are now making an investigation of the physical property of the companies for the purpose of determining the rates that shall be paid by the traveling public. The Public Utilities Commission, having practically similar power, is making a valuation of such properties in the District of Columbia. As the engineer commissioner says in the testimony and as the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission says as well, they are doing that for the purpose of giving them a basis upon which to fix the rates for gas.

Mr. President, if, pending that investigation by that commission, which has jurisdiction over the matter, by act of Congress the Senate wishes to intervene and to fix the price of gas without having made an investigation of the matter at all, I shall not find any fault; of course, I can not find any fault. It is for the Senate to determine whether it is wise to do so or not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senate has just decided on a roll-call vote that the provision shall remain in the bill limiting the price of gas to 70 cents to the Government. That provision was originally put in after the Public Utilities Commission act passed, as I have before called to the attention of the Senate. The amendment that I have suggested specifically provides that it shall not interfere with the Public Utilities Commission. There is not any doubt, however, that when the Public Utilities Commission gets through with their investigation they will fix the price at a lower rate than it is fixed in the amendment. There can not be any possible doubt of that when we take into consideration the fact that the company are paying 24 per cent dividends, and at the rate fixed, if they sold the same amount of gas, from their own figures they would have paid 15½ per cent dividend on their entire capital stock, one-half of which is water.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to modify my amendment.

Instead of striking out section 6, I desire to have the amendment follow line 22, on page 119, and I desire to put in the word "private" after the article "a" and before the word "consumer," so that it will read:

On and after the 1st day of October, 1916, the Washington Gas Light Co. shall not charge or collect for gas furnished a private consumer in any part of the District of Columbia a rate in excess of 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet of gas so furnished: Provided, That if a consumer of gas other than the Government or the District of Columbia shall not pay monthly any gas bill within 10 days after the same shall have been presented, said gas company may charge and collect from any such consumer so failing to pay said gas bill as aforesaid 10 cents additional for each 1,000 cubic feet of gas represented by said bill: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or taking away any of the powers now vested by law in the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

That would leave the bill as it is now and simply add my amendment as an additional provision, applying only to private consumers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My question may not seem very intelligent, but I want to be clear on one point. The Senator from Nebraska inserts a provision in his amendment to the effect that nothing herein contained shall take away the powers or rights of the Public Utilities Commission, or words to that effect?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the Senator's interpretation of that language, or what would the interpretation of that language be in the event that the Public Utilities Commission, after the investigation which it is now conducting, should decide that 80 cents was a proper rate?

Mr. NORRIS. Then, that would be the rate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia could, by indirectness, but none the less effectively, repeal a law of Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. They can do that now. For instance, we have provided now by law that the rate shall be 85 cents; but if the Public Utilities Commission to-day should fix it at 90 cents, it would be 90 cents; and if it should fix it at 60 cents, it would go down to 60 cents. My own judgment is, I will say to the Senator from New York, that that proviso is not necessary in the amendment, but I wanted it included to avoid any doubt about the proposition, so as not to interfere with the work of the Public Utilities Commission.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, how would it strike the Senator to make his amendment read so that it will permit the Public Utilities Commission to further reduce the price, but forbid the commission to increase the price above the amount named by Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. I would rather not have such a provision. My own idea is that it would be a good provision, but I am afraid that it would weaken the amendment. Some Senators might vote against it if that were in it, and I would not like to put such a provision in the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption, I shall be compelled to leave the Chamber, and before doing so I want to say a word on his amendment.

I have hesitated about advocating any amendment that might be offered to the bill as prepared by the committee. Very generally, I think with one exception, I have voted with the committee, because I believed its opportunity to judge and to investigate on practically every question was better than my own. I happen, however, to have had the misfortune to have been the mayor of a city, or, perhaps, I ought to say that the city had the misfortune to have me for its mayor. In that position I was called upon to and did investigate the question of the cost of the production of gas, the new methods employed in producing gas, together with the profits made by gas companies. One of the first illuminating facts I discovered was that no real information with reference to the fairness of any named price for gas could be obtained by comparing that price with the price charged in other cities of the country. I learned that substantially all of the gas plants in large cities were owned by two concerns, one of them commonly known as the U. G. I., or, to state the name fully, the United Gas & Improvement Co. of Philadelphia, Pa. That company, being what is called a parent or holding company, controls substantially all of the large gas plants in the northerly two-thirds of the United States.

The other holding company controls in the same manner the plants lying farther to the south; so that, to illustrate, when you compare the prices charged by the Kansas City plant with the prices charged by a plant in some other similar city of the United States, you are in each instance comparing the prices that were fixed by the same parent concern, and therefore a comparison of prices fixed under competitive conditions can not be had.

The method of organization of gas companies is interesting. I might illustrate it by the organization in my own city. There we had what was known as the Kansas City Gas Co. Its president was a distinguished citizen of my town. Its vice president was likewise a citizen. A number of its directors were local people, all of them eminently respectable, high-class citizens; but more than 50 per cent of the stock of the local company was owned by the United Gas & Improvement Co., or by the owners of the United Gas & Improvement Co., so that the management of the local company was completely within the domination of the Philadelphia people. During many years the local company, although highly prosperous, never declared a dividend upon any of its common stock. An investigation which I was able to make, arising through various lawsuits that were brought, developed the fact that it seemed to be the policy of the United Gas & Improvement people never to declare any dividends, or rarely to declare any dividends, upon common stock. Accordingly the common stock held by those outside the inner circle—by which I mean the Philadelphia people—was always at a low market value. But in order that the Philadelphia people might make money they had a scheme of management which compelled all of its subsidiary companies to obtain all of their supplies through a purchasing agent named by the United Gas & Improvement Co. Of course, in the process of purchase of supplies the profits of all the subsidiary companies were very adroitly milked out and fell into the pail of the United Gas & Improvement Co.

Moreover, they had another system of concealing profits. Out of the profits they made their extension of the local plants. To illustrate, a plant would be built for a city of 50,000 people. In the course of time that city would grow to a hundred, or perhaps three hundred or three hundred and fifty thousand people, and the mains would be extended at enormous cost, and the entire plant practically reconstructed, so as to accommodate the larger population, out of the profits. It follows that the value of the controlling stock was enormously enhanced from year to year, and the resident stockholder, who held only common stock, received no dividends, but the value of the control was multiplied many times.

Mr. President, I make this point because I want Senators to understand that when they compare the gas charges of Washington with the gas charges of other cities with the idea that the charge fixed in those other cities may give some insight into what is a proper charge here they are entirely in error, and this because they are comparing the charges of companies which are controlled by the same combination. Hence there is nothing whatever in the evidence of comparisons.

Mr. President, the truth is that American cities have been grafted upon by gas companies probably to a greater extent than by any other class of public-service corporations. When gas was first used, many years ago, the process of its manufacture was expensive. It was not only expensive, but it was a sort of mystery. People knew little about it. It required the consumption of enormous quantities of coal. Indeed, that was supposed to be the principal raw material from which gas was made. Some years ago an "inspired genius" found out that you could make gas out of air and water with a slight addition of those properties which are found in gasoline and in crude oil. The result was that gas could be made and put in the reservoirs—I say nothing of the distributing system or cost of distributing—at from 12 to 13 cents a thousand cubic feet. Now, the benefit of that revolution would have come to the American people, except that it could only reach them through these two great combinations, and the two great combinations took pains to see that it never did get to the American people.

I affirm that it is true, and susceptible of easy proof, that gas can be made in the city of Washington and distributed at a high profit at 60 cents per thousand cubic feet—delivered to the consumer at those prices. I make the statement because the fact is so patent and plain that I am sure I can not be in error. I believe it can be delivered at a much less rate.

I have one final word to say in regard to this Washington commission which some Members appear to think should be supreme. I do not know who constitute its membership; but I do know that a commission that can not ascertain in 60 days' time at the outside that gas can be made and delivered in the city of Washington at less than 85 cents is not worth the price of 1,000 feet of gas. There is no mystery about this matter any more. The cost of constructing a gas plant in the city of Washington can be estimated and stated by engineers in a very short space of time. The question as to whether the stock and bonds of the company represent good-faith investments can be easily ascertained. The cost of the production of gas can be proven by a hundred experts in the United States. The trouble with these commissions—I speak not of this one alone, but of nearly all of them—is that when they are organized they are composed of inexperienced men, and they proceed about their work in substantially the manner that a man might undertake a task who thought he had all of time for investigation and all of eternity for enforcement.

I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator for the considerations I have given, and if Congress does its full duty it will create a public-service commission having some vitality, some life, some potentiality, some force.

Why, Mr. President, in this city we are paying two fares to two different systems of railroads, and I suppose the Public Service Commission has not yet discovered that that is an injustice to the people of Washington; and yet it is a rare thing to find to-day an American city where such an outrage as that is allowed to be imposed upon the people. In my own city—and I hesitate to speak about a matter in which I was personally concerned—we had three or four or five traction companies, all of which went to the council and got their franchises extended for a quarter of a century, and they were signed, delivered, and accepted, concluding the highly honest business about 15 minutes before I took the oath of office as mayor. We did not have any transfer system, and none was provided for in the franchises referred to. Notwithstanding the fact that their franchises had been extended, were in their pockets, and expressly provided that each of those several companies should charge 5 cents for every passenger carried, after a controversy which lasted some months, and which was rather interesting to me, but is not to you, the companies were forced to give universal transfers. We have had them ever since. That is in a city, now, where the operation of a street railway is vastly more expensive than it is in Washington, because the city covers a larger territory, the population is more scattered, because the conformation of the surface of the ground is so much more rugged, because streams have to be bridged at great expense, and because of other causes I need not go into. And yet Kansas City was but a tardy follower of other American cities.

I do not know now of any city of the size and the importance of Washington that is not absolutely corporation ridden and controlled, the people of which are obliged to contribute two nickels to get from their homes to their place of business or labor. There may be such a city; but if you will point me to it, I will point you to a city that gave away its rights years ago through some improvidently granted franchise, or to a city controlled for private interests rather than for the public good.

We permit a telephone company in this city to charge rates to private houses which are higher than are charged in many cities. I do not, however, so much complain of that. My understanding is that it charges rates to business men that are extortionate beyond all reason and the limits of all decency.

That is not all. A great deal of this public service is of an inferior character. There are street cars running on the streets of Washington that would not be permitted in any up-to-date city of this country. The electric-light charges are extortionate. Mr. President, electric light can be furnished to private citizens in a city like Washington at a splendid profit at one-half the price now being exacted. I speak with some considerable knowledge of that question.

So that I am in favor of this amendment; and I hope that some member of the committee who has the time and opportunity to study the needs of the city of Washington will devote a portion of his time toward the abolition of these outrageous and wicked conditions. We talk here constantly of making this the model city of the United States. We expend millions of dollars of the people's money in building the monumental structures in which are housed the various departments of the Government. We lay out splendid parks and artistic drives. We try to make Washington the city beautiful and magnificent. In that we are justified because the greatest people on earth ought to have a Capital like the people. But while we are thus expending our energies and the taxes of the people for the beautification of Washington we ought to spend some of our time in seeing that it is not the habitat of the public-service grafter, and that the people of the city shall be exempted from unjust exactions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate, but I want to put in the RECORD a word or two further.

For a good many years we had been troubled with discussions in the Congress over the rates of gas and electric light and the cost of transportation on the street railroads, and the demand was made that we should have a public utilities commission to take charge of such matters.

Responding to that demand—most of the States having such commissions—a public utilities commission was created by law for the District of Columbia, and under the law that commission has authority to value the properties of the utility corporations and to fix the rates for which the service shall be rendered.

I took much interest in helping to frame that law as I took interest in framing a law requiring reciprocal transfers on the street railroads of the District of Columbia. That latter bill passed the Senate and went to another body, from which it never emerged. So that personally I am not responsible for the failure of that effort.

Now, Mr. President, a utilities commission was created and it has power to absolutely control all these matters that we are discussing to-day, and it does seem to me that this ought to be left in their hands. We were anxious to get this controversy out of Congress, and it was for that purpose that this commission was appointed.

Now, if notwithstanding the existence of this commission we are still going to have these controversies in Congress, I think we might as well abolish the commission at one time as another.

My view is that we ought to let the matter rest with that commission for the present, at least.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Can the Senator tell us how long this commission has been investigating the question of the cost of gas?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think since last autumn, according to the testimony of Col. Kutz.

Mr. JAMES. How long since it was created?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should judge three or four years ago, but I do not state that definitely.

Mr. JAMES. So they have been created three years and finally commenced to investigate the cost of gas last August.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. The Interstate Commerce Commission was created a great many years ago and it is just now taking the valuation of the railroads of the country for the purpose of fixing the rates, precisely as the Public Utilities Commission is doing in the District.

Mr. JAMES. It might be possible though by reducing the price of gas to 75 cents to hurry up the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be. If we should reduce it to 5 cents perhaps it would hurry it up still more.

In this debate certain criticisms have been passed upon the Committee on the District of Columbia, and especially upon me, who served as chairman of that committee for a good many years and as a member of the committee for 22 years.

Mr. President, for 22 years I made a martyr of myself in trying to do good work for the District of Columbia. Of course I failed in many particulars, but my work was conscientious and resulted in some good.

When I became a member of that committee gas was sold in the city of Washington for $1.25 a thousand feet. When I left the committee three years ago it was selling at 85 cents, which is the present price.

I will not stop to tell—it would seem egotistic on my part if I did—the efforts I made to secure a reduction from time to time, but I did make successful efforts on more than one occasion to get the reduction.

Eighty-five cents is a lower price than the average cities of the country are paying for gas. It was thought by the committee when I left it that we had done fairly well, and those of us who were interested in the establishment of a Public Utilities Commission felt that we could well turn over the matter for further reduction, if facts warranted it, to the Public Utilities Commission.

But, Mr. President, it seems that the agitation is not to cease, that it is to go on, and that regardless of the fact that there is a commission that has jurisdiction over this matter, without investigation, without inquiry, because no inquiry has been made as to whether this company can furnish gas at 70 cents or 75 cents a thousand, or not, we are to legislate here.

Now, as I said a few minutes ago, I have no interest in this matter at all. I pay my gas bill. I shall be glad if I can get gas cheaper than I am getting it, if it can be furnished cheaper; but I do think this is rather a harsh way to reach a conclusion that ought to be left in the hands of the commission which was constituted for that purpose and which has absolute authority over the matter.

I left the committee, as I said, three years ago. I allowed myself to remain on the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations considering District matters, but I do not expect to remain in that capacity much longer.

That committee gave several weeks of careful consideration to all the matters that were presented before it. We have worked not only days but nights as well on this bill, and after it has been presented to the Senate, if motives are to be questioned, if actions are to be condemned, there is very little encouragement for a self-respecting man who might well be taking his vacation as other Senators are doing, to remain here and continue to do work such as we have been doing.

I presume the Senate will pass this amendment. It will not affect me, as I have said before, one way or another, but it will affect necessarily and beyond peradventure the proper solution of this question by the commission which properly has it in charge.

The Senator from Nebraska has attached to his amendment a provision that it will not interfere with that commission. Col. Kutz said in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee that action by Congress will have an injurious effect upon the work of that commission; but, whether it has or not, I want to repeat that, having created a commission which has jurisdiction over these matters, we ought, in justice to the commission and in justice to ourselves, to leave the matter in the hands of that body, which is the creation of Congress.

Now, that is about all I care to say. As I said—

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not want to interrupt the Senator except to make a statement, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be very happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, though not a member of the subcommittee which has this matter in charge. I have perfect confidence in the subcommittee, and I will say that I have most implicit confidence in the Senator from New Hampshire.

No one appreciates his conscientious work more than I do, and the vote which I cast a few moments ago in opposition to the committee report was not intended as any reflection upon the Senator from New Hampshire or upon any other member of the committee. I am at a loss to know, however, how the proposed action of the Senator from Nebraska could in any manner affect the work of the commission to which the Senator has referred.

I wish to state further that I have been interested in the gas discussion in the Senate and House for some time, and personally I have been convinced that the gas company could furnish gas to the people of this District at a lower price than that at which they are furnishing it. I believed, from the reports which have been made and which I have read, that I was entirely warranted in voting for the provision in the House bill, and that I would be warranted in voting for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, because it seems to me that if we fixed the price at 75 cents per thousand it can not possibly interfere with the work of the Utilities Commission, as we have heretofore fixed it at 85 cents, and we could fix it at 75 cents, or even lower. The investigation and report of the commission may disclose that we have made a mistake. If I believed that there was a reasonable possibility that we would make a mistake and do an injustice to the company, I would not support the amendment; but believing as I do, from such information as has come to me, that we can make this change and not do an injustice to the company, but do a partial justice to the District, it seems to me that it is my duty to support it.

But I rose principally to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that no vote of mine must be construed as being any reflection upon him or upon the other members of the committee, of which I am one. I voted in that way because, from the evidence submitted, it seemed to me that I was doing my simple duty.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not sensitive about a matter of this kind. I did not question any vote that was cast on the amendment a little while ago. Each Senator has the same right that I have to his opinion, and the same right to vote as he thinks proper, and I had no purpose of making any criticism along that line. What I did want to say—and I have said it very bunglingly, because I am very tired—was that it does seem to me an extraordinary matter, after we thought we had gotten rid of these controversies in Congress, which have extended over the 25 years I have served in the Senate and the 4 years I served in the other House, by appointing a Public Utilities Commission, that the agitation is still continued here while that commission is making an investigation for the very purpose of determining a basis upon which to fix the price of gas in this District.

If the Senate wishes to continue legislating in that way, I have no objection to it; it does not affect me one way or the other; but it is hardly fair to impose the burden upon a committee of spending days and weeks and months in investigating a matter of this kind, and then for Senators to come in and throw that work overboard and say that Congress ought to take jurisdiction over this subject, when by a statute which we have enacted we have placed the matter in the hands of three gentlemen, who, we have confidence to believe, will act wisely and well when they have ascertained the facts upon which to base their conclusions. That is what I wanted to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there are going to be any further amendments, I suggest that we must have an executive session this afternoon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Utah, but the Chair understands that there is another amendment which has not been acted upon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator from Utah to yield to me to present two amendments to this bill, in order that they may be printed and be on the desks of Senators in the morning.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I send the amendments to the desk and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

O Thou great Father Soul, in whom our trust is stayed and in whom our fondest hopes have their origin, help us to draw from Thee yet higher aspirations, that as individuals and as a Nation we may go forward to greater achievements, and thus be instruments in Thy hands for the dissemination of wider activities, which are potent influences for the development of the possibilities within us; that we may work out our own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God which worketh in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure. Thus bless, guide, and support us in all our earnest endeavors. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT (H. DOC. NO. 1314).

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 333.

Resolved, That House resolution 330, passed July 29, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, modified so as to authorize the printing as a House document of 50,000 copies of the Federal farm-loan act, annotated and indexed by direction of the chairman of the Joint Committee on Rural Credits, of which 10,000 shall be placed with the House document room and 40,000 with the folding room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I should like to know if the gentleman will yield for a few questions on this resolution.

Mr. GLASS. I will state to the gentleman that practically the same resolution was passed several days ago. We simply left out the provision for the marginal notes and index, which are now included.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Who prepared this index and annotation?

Mr. GLASS. It was prepared by the secretary of the joint committee.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. W. W. Flannagan?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; in conjunction with the index clerks of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I have no doubt it has been well done; but now I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that 50,000 copies of this law are a sufficient number to be printed?

Mr. GLASS. I thought so. The Senate asked for the printing of 65,000 copies, but I thought 50,000 copies would be ample for the present.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. It looks to me as though we might well double the number to be printed.

Mr. MANN. We can easily order more copies.

Mr. GLASS. We can order more copies if necessary.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Congress may adjourn in a few days.

Mr. MANN. There is no probability of it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I should like very much to have the gentleman consent to the printing of 75,000 copies.

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection to doing it, if there shall be no objection from any other source, but I would not like to complicate it.

Mr. MANN. I think 50,000 copies are enough for the present. That is what we authorized the other day.

Mr. GLASS. I assure the gentleman that if there is a demand for more copies, after the 50,000 copies are exhausted, we shall be glad to order the printing of more copies.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Congress may adjourn, and then the printing can not be authorized.

Mr. GLASS. Congress is not likely to adjourn for a month yet.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. This is an important measure. The farmers are interested in it, and it ought to be very freely circulated and distributed.

Mr. GLASS. It will take several months to get this system organized. Congress will reconvene before the system is organized, and there will be ample time to have other copies printed.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Is this resolution subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. First it is necessary to get unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will not object to its consideration.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. I have no doubt that all the copies of this law which are desired ought to be printed. In my own district, where I am fairly well known, from the cartoons which have been printed from time to time, I have received but one request for a copy of this act.

Mr. GLASS. I quite agree that the number of copies ordered is ample for the present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, I should like to submit a question of personal privilege. If it will not take long to dispose of this resolution, I shall not object. If it is going to take a long time, I do object. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia how long it will probably take?

Mr. GLASS. Not over one minute, I think.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma wants to know if this resolution is subject to amendment. If the gentleman wishes to offer an amendment, the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that if there is a demand for further copies we will increase the number. There will be no trouble about that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] says he has a question of personal privilege. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] was granted the right to extend his remarks in the Record, and in extending them, on the 19th day of July last, on page 13104 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under the heading "Exposure of oleomargarine interest's attempts at deception," the gentleman from Wisconsin says:

Yet it was but a short time before the real purposes of the same and the hypocrisy which prompted the introduction of this resolution were indirectly exposed in this House by a speech made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], delivered on the 1st day of April, 1916.

In various parts of the speech of the gentleman from Maryland can be found positive evidence that such resolution was introduced and is being urged for passage not by those who are unselfishly interested in the promotion and maintenance of the public health by preventing the sale and distribution of insanitary dairy products. Certain remarks of the gentleman and quotations from certain alleged dairy and farm papers show conclusively to the friends of dairymen that the main purpose behind such resolution is to attack, to degrade, and to prejudice butter in the minds of the consuming public.

The gentleman goes on in that vein throughout his speech against me, intimating that I had introduced this resolution not in the interest of the public health, not in the interest of the people, but that it was hypocrisy which led to its introduction, whereas the sole purpose of the introduction of the resolution was for the prevention of impurities in the butter products distributed in this country. I feel that I ought to have the right to address this House in answer to the statements by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] which were extended in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under leave to print. I ask leave to address the House on a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to address the House on a question of personal privilege, but he has that right anyway.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, on July 19, 1916, there appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on pages 13100 to 13105, the extension of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE]. Charges are made therein that House resolution 137, introduced by me, was introduced "to degrade and to prejudice butter in the minds of the consuming public." The gentleman also charges that "the real purposes and the hypocrisy which prompted the introduction of this resolution were indirectly exposed in this House by a speech made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], delivered on the 1st day of April, 1916."

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin has exceeded his rights in his charges against me. He has, wittingly or unwittingly, flatly disregarded the facts. He has made no attempt to place in the record the terrible situation disclosed at the hearing before the Committee on Rules on House resolution 137, held April 11, 1916. He has carefully ignored the testimony of Dr. A. D. Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture; the testimony of Dr. John R. Mohler, assistant chief of that division; the testimony of Dr. E. C. Schroeder, superintendent of the department experiment station, at Bethesda, Md.

The gentleman charges that the "oleomargarine interests are behind and actively supporting House resolution 137, and that the farm papers, dairy journals, and newspapers from which I made quotations in my speech of April 1, 1916, are all owned and controlled by the oleomargarine interests."

I wish now to state to the House that the charges made by the gentleman from Wisconsin are false. In answer to these false charges the House shall have the facts.

House resolution 137 was introduced by me after a long investigation of the subject. The matter was first brought to my attention by John H. Ferguson, president of the Maryland Federation of Labor. The central labor body of my State instructed its president to take up the fight for clean dairy products. Solely in the interests of my constituents, and seeking only to protect them and other consumers, I introduced House resolution 137. On investigation I found the gravest charges had been brought against the dairymen of this country by the great Department of Agriculture. I found that expert bacteriologists had charged that 20 per cent of our dairy cattle were dying or infected with bovine tuberculosis. I found that post mortem examinations of the bodies of very young children proved that a shocking number of them were dying of bovine tuberculosis. I found that insanitary conditions in dairies were putting filth and disease into the mouths of consumers of dairy products.

I felt the public should know the facts, that a full, free, and honest investigation by Members of this House would produce those facts, that the Members who made the investigation would be especially qualified to recommend to this House legislation, if any be needed, to correct the conditions found.

A hearing was had on House resolution 137 on April 11, 1916, before the Committee on Rules of this House.

Dr. A. D. Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture was asked, "Is a large percentage of the dairy products that are consumed by the American people unfit for food or not?" And Dr. Melvin answered, "We think so."

Dr. E. C. Schroeder, expert bacteriologist of the Department of Agriculture, stated to the committee that 300 children die annually in New York City of bovine tuberculosis, and, on this basis, the annual death rate in the United States from bovine tuberculosis is 6,000 children every year.

Dr. John R. Mohler, Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, told the committee that he had personally examined the bodies of a number of children who died of tuberculosis and found that over 22 per cent had died of bovine tuberculosis.

Dr. Schroeder said at the hearing that over 9 per cent, or 2,000,000, of our dairy cows have tuberculosis and are capable of transmitting that disease to children.

The evidence shows that bovine tuberculosis is on the rise, due largely to infection of sound stock by infected skimmed milk returned from the creamery or separating stations where good and bad, pure and diseased milk is run together through the separators, and the whole mass of skimmed milk thus contaminated returned to the farms for feeding purposes.

There was no answer made to the charges of the Government's scientists and officials. The dairymen were present, as they always are, I find. After we had showed up a rotten, diseased, and death-dealing agency, the tubercular cow, they said they were in favor of an investigation but against the passage of my resolution. There and then the oleomargarine business was dragged into the discussion, and at all times subsequent the answer and the only answer to the proof we have offered is now, and has been, the charge that the "oleo" men are seeking to traduce the dairymen. No one has come forward to disprove the statements of scientists, but from time to time champions of butter who, strange to relate, have in their districts a large number of voting dairymen rise to ably defend the tuberculosis cow by crying this everlasting bugaboo of "oleomargarine." When we show that 6,000 babies are dying every year, done to death by our 2,000,000 tuberculous cows, the butter champion replies, "You must pay no attention to such charges, because it is only the 'oleo' men seeking to destroy the dairy industry."

A Member of this House is branded a hypocrite because he seeks to protect his people who have no protection from the tubercular cow. All I have and still ask for is an investigation by a committee of this House appointed by the Speaker. Why is it that the dairymen fight this investigation? Do they believe the Speaker and the committee he would appoint would be "oleo" men? Have the dairy champions reason to believe that an investigation would be conducted solely to traduce and destroy their business? No. They and their champions fear only the facts; they fear only that with the facts before Congress legislation would be enacted putting a stop to their criminal practices.

Mr. Speaker, no Congress in the history of this Nation and no nation in peace has ever appropriated such tremendous sums of money as we are now appropriating for "preparedness." We are following the immortal words of Pinckney and spending "millions for defense." Yes; hundreds of millions for defense against a possible foreign foe, but not one cent are we spending to eradicate the tubercular cow. We are paying a terrible tribute in babies' lives to the dairy industry; almost one baby every hour of this day, and every day of the year, is dying because we will not defend them from this open and notorious source of contamination. Over 93,000 people die annually of all forms of tuberculosis in our country. We spend vast sums for sanatoria, we build health resorts, we run mad over fake cures, but here at our hands is a weapon with which we can save 6,000 children annually, yet we do not take up that weapon. No; we listen rather to the cry of the dairy owners, and it is always the same old cry, "oleomargarine."

Did the "oleo" people inspire the scientists of the Department of Agriculture? Do the "oleo" men own and control all the eminent bacteriologists of this country? Did the greasy hand of oleomargarine write the indictment in the Report of the Department of Agriculture for 1912, wherein it is charged that over 95 per cent of the creameries and cream-buying stations examined were insanitary to a greater or less degree?

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I will yield to the gentleman after I have concluded.

It was on the written, uncontroverted statements of the Government's own scientists, eminent bacteriologists, and on the Report of the Department of Agriculture for 1912 that my resolution (H. Res. 137) was based.

Now, if all these sources of information are "oleo" controlled, if the "oleo" men and not the dairy men maintain the 2,000,000 tubercular cows, then, and then only, the gentleman from Wisconsin is right; but, personally, I know little and care less about this trade war. I do not know an "oleo" man nor anyone connected with the oleomargarine business. What I do know is that the gentleman from Wisconsin, like all these other valiant champions of tubercular cows, is afflicted with a malady best described as "oleophobia."

This is their first, last, and only argument, for they never produce any facts against positive proof that the tubercular cows in our dairies are taking an hourly toll in babies' lives.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin says the article in Hoard's Dairyman of May 5, 1916, is a complete answer to my resolution and my speech of April 1, 1916.

It were well here to note—and I particularly call it to his attention—that the article he has inserted in the record deals almost exclusively with two minor and unimportant charges made in my speech of April 1, 1916; that is to say, "coloring matter in butter" and "revenue frauds." If these were the only charges I had to bring, I would never have entered this fight. Let the dairymen color their butter in imitation of the June product if they want to. It is unfair and dishonest, but if the constituents of the dairy champions here in this House want to be unfair and dishonest about their product and their champions are willing to stand up here and defend them, then let them go on fooling the public. That costs only money, not lives. The same is true of the revenue frauds. I heartily commend the activities of the Treasury Department in running down the offenders against the laws taxing oleomargarine. Those offenders generally mixed butter and oleomargarine and sold the compound as butter. They were in the butter business—at least, they said they were—and they were properly prosecuted.

Dr. Melvin said at the hearing on April 11, 1916, that these frauds could not have occurred had there been in effect a Federal inspection of butter making. The only way to stamp out these frauds is to inspect butter-making plants. The straight oleomargarine plants are already under inspection. However, again this is only a matter of dollars and cents, not of life and death. What Hoard's Dairyman did not answer, what the gentleman from Wisconsin did not answer, what no man has, what no man can answer is this one terrible fact that we permit 2,000,000 tubercular dairy cows in this country to take the lives of 6,000 babies every year. While I have been addressing this House one child has given its life. Before we adjourn for the day others will have died. The toll goes steadily on, and the consumers in my district pay their toll of death to the tubercular cows in the districts of these dairy champions.

Now let us have the facts. If your dairies are clean and your cows are sound, you need not fear the verdict. It is high time that the dairy defenders drop the "oleo" cry and come out in the open, and before another champion of the tubercular cow rises in this House to defame me, let him clean the curse of bovine tuberculosis out of his own district. [Applause.]

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REILLY. Is it not a fact that after the gentleman introduced this resolution he started to create a propaganda at home to have Members of Congress memorialize all clubs?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is a fact that I endeavored to bring that resolution to the attention of every person in the United States that I possibly could reach, and I shall continue the fight until it is won.

Mr. REILLY. Did not the gentleman ask women's clubs and other organizations to write Congressmen?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not remember any letters of that kind which I sent out. I do know that we got thousands of women's clubs to indorse the resolution, and literature was sent out to all the clubs.

Mr. REILLY. I received copies of the gentleman's letter from clubs.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then the gentleman did not need to ask me that question.

Mr. REILLY. I wanted to know whether it went out with the gentleman's consent.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Everything sent out over my name in the interest of the better dairy-products' fight went out with my consent and my O. K. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the subject of the recent dynamite explosion which occurred in my district.

GEORGE H. BOSKE.

Mr. LLOYD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, I want to present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which will not create any controversy, I am sure. I present the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 332 (H. Rept. 1068).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to George H. Boske, clerk to HUNTER H. MOSS, late a Representative from the State of West Virginia, at the time of his death, July 15, 1916, the sum of $125, being an amount equal to one month's salary of a clerk of a Member of the House.

The following committee amendment was read:

Amend, in line 3, by striking out the word "Boske" and inserting "Poske."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the recent dynamite explosion in New Jersey, it having occurred in my district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the recent dynamite explosion in the harbor of New York, it having occurred in the gentleman's district. Is there objection?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire in what way that interferes with the leave granted me previously? I would like to inquire what order I would come in under the leave heretofore granted?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would come next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey, if the House grants leave to address the House, would come first, and then the gentleman from Illinois for half an hour, then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] for one hour, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] for 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] for 30 minutes.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Then I understand that I would immediately follow the gentleman from New Jersey if this leave is granted?

The SPEAKER. After clearing up the business on the Speaker's table, not to interfere with conference reports.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Then I do not object.

Mr. BURNETT. Reserving the right to object, I understand there is an hour and a half laid out for gentlemen to speak. I ask unanimous consent that I may call up the flood resolution that has already passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. There are various bills on the Speaker's table which are to come up for disposition, and the gentleman can come in at that time.

The SPEAKER. These matters on the Speaker's table will all come before the speeches are made. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. KONOP. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask if I can get permission to talk for 30 minutes after all these gentlemen have concluded their speeches?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] he may address the House not to exceed 30 minutes, subject to the other conditions. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, would not the gentleman from Wisconsin just as lief come in on Friday?

Mr. KONOP. It would suit me just as well.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] if we are to adjourn over until Friday?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to know whether if unanimous consent be given to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey, the matters on the Speaker's table will come in before the pre-arranged speeches that are to be made to-day?

The SPEAKER. They will come in before the speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, if he should ever get permission to speak. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does that include the calling up of the bills on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It includes whatever business is on the Speaker's table. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Where is the bill?

Mr. BURNETT. It was messaged over this morning. There is a House bill reported.

The SPEAKER. Of similar tenor?

Mr. BURNETT. The same, exactly.

Mr. MANN. This has to be by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked for unanimous consent.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 160, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 160.

Appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi, and for other purposes.

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $540,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of persons suffering and in destitution by reason of recent floods in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi; and the Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is authorized to expend so much of the aforesaid sum as he may deem necessary in supplying such seeds as may be suitable to produce quick growing crops to provide food for the population and animals of the flood areas; and to supply the destitute with some form of employment at a moderate rate of pay, said employment to be under the supervision of Army officers and in cooperation with local officials; and the Secretary of War is also authorized to furnish such supplies of the Quartermaster and Medical Departments as he may deem proper to those who are destitute and unable to work, but for a period not exceeding 90 days from the passage of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would state just the necessity for the appropriation, how it is to be expended, and what investigation has been made by the War Department or other officials of the Government concerning the matter.

[Mr. BURNETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I want to call attention, Mr. Speaker, to the conditions existing along the Tombigbee, as well as along these other famous rivers to which reference has been made. Here is a letter that I received addressed to me on July 21 by Mr. B. A. Lincoln:

Hon. E. S. CANDLER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.
COLUMBUS, MISS., July 21, 1916.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find resolution passed by the board of supervisors of Lowndes County at a special meeting held yesterday the 20th instant. You will notice this resolution is asking your aid in securing congressional aid for the destitute in Lowndes and adjoining counties, made so by the excessive floods of recent date.

There is untold suffering among the negroes, many of them without food and have lost all they had. Crops completely destroyed and live stock gone, consequently they need aid. Still there are lots of poor white people here in the same condition, made destitute by the high water. This is certainly worthy of notice and consideration by Congress, and I hope that you will be able to secure some aid for these people.

Assuring you that we will be deeply grateful for anything you can do for these poor, destitute people, and with best wishes, I ask to remain,
Yours, very truly,

B. A. LINCOLN,
Clerk Board of Supervisors Lowndes County, Miss.

Here is a resolution which was passed by the board of supervisors of the county that sets forth the condition, and I will ask that this be extended in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. This shows absolute destitution in that section of the country. The people are absolutely in want. Here is the resolution:

MINUTES OF THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS, LOWNDES COUNTY, MISS., JULY 20, 1916.

Whereas by the recent and unusual floods in Lowndes and adjacent counties crops and stock have been lost and great damage done and many of the people losing their all, and thereby causing great destitution and suffering, and they being greatly in need of immediate relief and assistance: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Representative in Congress, the Hon. E. S. CANDLER, be, and he is hereby, earnestly requested to do all in his power to obtain relief for the destitute by congressional aid, and that the clerk certify this resolution to Hon. E. S. CANDLER.

The STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
Lowndes County:

I, B. A. Lincoln, clerk of the Board of Supervisors of Lowndes County, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolution passed by the Board of Supervisors of Lowndes County at a special meeting of said board held on the 20th day of July, 1916, as the same appears of record in my office.

Given under my hand and seal of said board at office in Columbus, Miss., this the 21st day of July, 1916.

B. A. LINCOLN, Clerk.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before each gentleman recites the condition in his district I want to get a little information. As I understand, this resolution provides for an appropriation of $540,000, about $240,000 of it to be used for seeds and things of that sort.

Mr. CANNON. Thirteen thousand dollars for seeds.

Mr. MANN. Oh, $13,000 for seeds on the Alabama River only. Now, it is proposed to use a large share of the appropriation in furnishing employment, and the letter of the Secretary of War apparently states that that is to be upon the country roads in those States.

Are we under any obligation, having passed a roads bill which makes an appropriation, a certain amount of which is available in those States, now to appropriate a further sum of money for the improvement of the roads in those States?

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman, I suppose the idea is that those people had better have employment, if possible, and therefore it would be better to give them employment of that kind than to furnish them with food and supplies without employment.

Mr. MANN. Very well. But if we give them employment upon the roads would it not be fair that any sum of money thus expended in any of these States on the roads should be deducted from the Federal appropriation for roads in those States?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, there is one thing that I do not think the gentleman caught. The roads referred to by the Secretary of War meant the roads destroyed by the flood. Some of them are roads almost as good as Pennsylvania Avenue, and they are now destroyed and ruined.

Mr. MANN. Very well. That happens everywhere. But the roads bill in itself gives a special preference to these States.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BRITT. The provisions of the Federal roads law allowing money to be expended on roads in the States are dependent, first, upon the performance of certain conditions on the part of the States, which require the organization of the State highway commissions.

Mr. MANN. We all understand that. I am not asking that this money be expended in accordance with the new road law; but why should not the amount of money be deducted from the amount of money allowed to the States? There is such a thing as fairness in all these things.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I went over this matter very carefully with the Secretary of War—

Mr. MANN. I understand a number of gentlemen have done that.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I hope the gentleman will give me permission to state the conclusion we have arrived at. It is not intended by the Secretary of War to lay out any new system of highways or to do any permanent work anywhere. It is not intended by the Secretary of War to attempt any new system of road building. But down in the country from which I come and from which these other gentlemen come we have a great many indigent negroes who work around upon these farms. If we once open up the idea to them that they can go in there and draw supplies without doing any work at all, it will pauperize the communities from which they come, and they will leave the farms; and while it might be considered a temporary blessing to them it would be a great curse in the long run. The idea is not to do any permanent work on the roads. I do not believe that under the prevailing conditions the work to be performed will last more than a few weeks at the most. The whole idea is to pay these men a smaller sum of money per day than is paid on the farms and elsewhere, and this is limited to 60 days. It will merely provide for those who can not get work elsewhere and enable them to do that kind of work that is not skilled and can not be of permanent benefit there. But it will provide them with a daily living until they can make a daily living elsewhere.

Mr. MANN. If there is any limit of 60 days, I did not catch it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Ninety days.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says it will pauperize the people. The question with me is whether it will pauperize the States to say that whenever anything happens the Government is going to build roads for them without charging it to them. If the States can not appropriate this money because the legislatures are not in session, and if the exigency really exists, why should not gentlemen representing those States here be willing to have these amounts of money charged to the funds to be credited to those States under the road law?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Because it has never been done by the Government in connection with any other relief work that has been done by the Federal Government.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is very liberal with the Federal Treasury, but—

Mr. BURNETT. Under the wording of the resolution the idea is to supply the destitute with some form of employment at a moderate rate of pay, the said employment to be under the supervision of Army officers.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the resolution to that effect; but the letter which the gentleman read from the Secretary of War, and which letter I believe is made the basis of the report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the resolution of the House, states that the money is to be expended on the improvement of the roads.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It may be.

Mr. MANN. It is to be.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It says "in repairing navigable streams."

Mr. BURNETT. In giving employment, and it is suggested that that is one form of employment. But I understand the committee, by the resolution or the report, intended to employ men on the roads.

Mr. MANN. With the statement of the Secretary of War that that is what he proposes to do with the fund, we have a right to assume that that is what will be done with the fund. Now, I ask the gentleman from Alabama, would he not be perfectly willing for his State, if ten or fifteen or twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars of this fund is to be expended on the roads of his State, to have that charged against the fund that is being appropriated for roads in Alabama?

Mr. DENT. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to that being incorporated in the resolution, except that it will delay the passage of it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The discussion which is going on among five or six men, who are talking among themselves, is not addressed to the Chair, and I should like to know how long it is going to last?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can go out if he wants to.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is whether there shall be unanimous consent to consider this bill.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman had his proposition up we were quite lenient about it.

The SPEAKER. We are getting along very nicely. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield to my colleague Mr. DENT.

Mr. DENT. I was stating that personally I would have no objection to any amount of this fund that should be utilized for the purpose of road construction in Alabama being deducted from the sum heretofore appropriated but for the fact that it would simply delay the passage of this resolution; and I am sure that the sum that would be expended would be so insignificant that it would not be worth the delay. As my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] states, I do not see that there is any authority in the resolution itself for the Secretary to use this fund for that purpose, although there is a statement in his letter which indicates that that would be one of the methods by which he would use this appropriation, or might use it.

Mr. MANN. Surely the gentleman did not mean to say that there was no authority in the resolution to use the money for that purpose.

Mr. DENT. I do not see any authority.

Mr. RAGSDALE. There is no direction to that effect.

Mr. MANN. Does not the resolution authorize the Secretary to use the money to hunt ducks if he wants to?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just so he uses it for the relief of these people.

Mr. MANN. He could use it to dig out rat holes.

Mr. DENT. There is nothing that requires him to use it in this way, as my colleague states.

Mr. MANN. There is no direction.

Mr. DENT. But as far as the resolution itself goes, it simply says that he shall use the funds to supply the destitute with some form of employment at a moderate rate of pay, said employment to be under the supervision of Army officers and in cooperation with local officials. Under that I do not believe—

Mr. MANN. I am going to object for the present. Perhaps the resolution can be called up later in the day or on Friday, but temporarily, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. Temporarily. We may reach it later in the day.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that the Committee on Military Affairs have reported a similar resolution.

Mr. DENT. The Military Affairs Committee have reported a similar resolution. This resolution is unanimously reported to—day. The only difference is that Tennessee was incorporated in the Senate resolution and not in the House resolution.

CANCELLATION OF AN ENROLLED BILL.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of a concurrent resolution, the Chair announces that he has canceled his signature to House bill 12197.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The other day the Speaker announced that he had appointed certain gentlemen from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as the House members of a joint committee under Senate resolution No. 60. The resolution provides that the committee shall be appointed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Before the announcement was made the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ADAMSON] reported to the Speaker the names of the persons whom he wanted to have serve on the joint committee. There was some doubt about whether the appointment should be made by him or by the Speaker, and so the Chair announced them.

Mr. MANN. There can not be any question about who was to appoint them. The resolution provided that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce should appoint them. I think the chairman of the committee ought to announce to the House that his committee has appointed them, so there will be no question about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know how this came up. A gentleman was talking to me; so I did not hear the beginning of it. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rose and said that the other day the Speaker announced the appointment of certain gentlemen from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee as the House members of a joint committee, and that the resolution provided that the committee itself should appoint them.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Speaker and I talked about that—

The SPEAKER. Now, if the gentleman from Georgia is ready to announce his committee, he will proceed to do it.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce elected the members of the joint committee in accordance with the announcement that the Speaker made. The Speaker stated to me that if I handed the list to him he would announce it. The committee elected as the House members of that joint committee Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, Mr. CULLOP, Mr. ESCH, and Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. That settles it.

Mr. ADAMSON. And those are the names that the Speaker announced.

The SPEAKER. That is the end of it.

TETON NATIONAL FOREST, WYO.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House the bill (H. R. 12208) adding certain lands to the Teton National Forest, Wyo., with a Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the Speaker shall lay before the House H. R. 12208 with a Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the title of the bill and the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the telegram and letter are as follows:

MESSAGE FROM SENATOR SUTHERLAND.

SALT LAKE CITY, July 31, 1916.

Hon. CHARLES E. HUGHES,
Hotel Astor, New York City:

You will no doubt recall our conversation a few days ago when I urged you to make public your views with regard to the equal suffrage Federal amendment. I feel quite sure there is nothing in the Republican platform which in any manner would conflict with such a declaration. That platform commits the party to the principle of woman suffrage and recognizes the right of each State to determine the question for itself. It is silent upon the subject of the constitutional amendment, and therefore leaves everybody of the party free to determine for himself this question.

The submission of the amendment is desired by many millions of voters, and I think the day has come when Congress should recognize this widespread desire by adopting the resolution of submission and thus enabling the States to pass upon the question, which, without the preliminary action of Congress, they will be prevented from doing.

There is a feeling of intense interest in all these suffrage States in respect to your attitude, and I think it most important that you should as soon as possible state publicly your personal position in respect to the matter.

GEORGE SUTHERLAND.

LETTER TO SENATOR SUTHERLAND.

HOTEL ASTOR, NEW YORK CITY,
August 1, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your telegram has been received. In my answer to the notification I did not refer to the proposed Federal amendment relating to woman suffrage, as this was not mentioned in the platform. I have no objection, however, to stating my personal views. As I said in my speech, I think it to be most desirable that the question of woman suffrage should be settled promptly. The question is of such a nature that it should be settled for the entire country.

My view is that the proposed amendment should be submitted and ratified and the subject removed from political discussion.

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the speeches which have just been authorized to be inserted in the Record of Senator HARDING and Mr. Hughes may be also printed as a House document, so that they will be in a more convenient form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the speeches of Senator HARDING and Mr. Hughes be published as a House document. Is there objection?

There was no objection (H. Doc. No. 1315).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the House document just authorized the letter from Senator SUTHERLAND to Mr. Hughes and the telegram in answer thereto on woman suffrage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to print in the public document just authorized the letter of Senator SUTHERLAND to Mr. Hughes and the telegram in answer thereto. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he wants to put that in the public document as well as in the Record?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; as a part of the document to be published containing the speeches of Mr. Hughes and Senator HARDING. On reflection, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is all right for the others to go in as a public document, but I do not think these belong in it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming has withdrawn his request.

Mr. ADAMSON. But I want to say something, anyway.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMILL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say in this connection that in a few days there will be such an overwhelming demand from the people for the truth when the next President of the United States is notified—

Mr. MANN. I have just put that speech in the Record. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON (continuing). By the Democratic committee that we ought not to object to this little by-play, because the people will demand the notification speech of the next President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me a part of his time—

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. In reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I just wanted to tell this little Sunday-school story.

Mr. ADAMSON. Where did the gentleman hear it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. The school-teacher was teaching some little boys and she read them of the fight between David and Goliath, where Goliath pranced out with his mailed armor calling upon his foes to give battle or to send a representative, when a little fellow piped up and said, "Skip that ma'am; he is blowing." [Laughter.]

EXPLOSION OF AMMUNITION IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House some considerations upon a subject with which they are no doubt familiar in a general way. On last Sunday, in the early hours of the morning, a terrific explosion occurred in Jersey City. The effects of the catastrophe were widespread. Buildings in New York City and in Jersey City and in all the surrounding territory comprised within the Metropolitan district were rocked and wrecked, and the people, panic-stricken and in their night clothes, fled to the street. That Sunday morning will ever be remembered by the people in and around New York as a night of unspeakable horror.

It is for us to determine what we as the Congress shall do to prevent the further existence of the atrocious conditions which caused this widespread disaster.

The ammunition manufacturers of the country, the powder manufacturers, the bullet makers, those who traffic in the instruments of death, have turned Black Tom Island, an artificial peninsula connected with the mainland of Jersey City, into an arsenal for the use and convenience of the warring nations of Europe. The lives of people in the most congested portion of the country, 7,000,000 and more, are placed in hourly dread of death and property of incalculable value subjected to imminent destruction. And all this in order that the makers of these instruments of death may fatten their bank deposits on the profits which they harvest from their inhuman traffic. At this particular time I have no observations to offer upon that phase of the question—on the baseness and inhumanity of it—but I do say that if ammunition and high explosives are to be shipped out of the United States they ought to be shipped safely or not at all. Some other place should be found for loading them upon the boats than in and about the harbor of New York. Some other place should be found other than congested communities through which to move them at the peril of millions of human lives.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad the distinguished chairman of the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is now here to listen to what I have to say, because I desire to announce that I shall introduce a bill with which he will probably have to deal, providing that where ammunition is shipped for other use than that of the United States Army, its transit and its storage shall be subject wholly to the regulations of the community through which the commodity passes, particularly where this community is a railroad terminal located on a river, as is Jersey City, which fronts on the harbor of New York. This is the subjects to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The Interstate Commerce Commission claims to have the power to deal with this subject, though I do not think it has all the power it claims. Yet if you bring any case to the notice of the Interstate Commerce Commission they will send you to Col. Dunn, who is the head of the bureau of explosives. I know very little about Col. Dunn, except that he is a high scientific expert, and also a very honorable gentleman. He is the inventor of the explosive called "dunnite" and he is the head of the bureau of explosives, which is not a Government bureau, but a department established by the united railroads of the country from which source he draws his salary. When you go to the Interstate Commerce Commission they send you to Col. Dunn, and he decides the question whether or not these combustibles shall be allowed to remain in congested communities, how they shall be removed, and all the regulations concerning them. The result of that has been the unprecedented and horror-inspiring explosions which the people of my district and the people of New York experienced last Sunday. I do not make any charge against Col. Dunn, but I suggest this for your consideration. We know that judges are single minded in their efforts to do justice, and generally of high probity, and yet when a question is to be determined we preclude any judge from sitting who has an interest in the controversy, not because we believe him corrupt, but because we realize the natural tendency of a man's mind to be biased when dealing with a subject in which he is financially interested. The Interstate Commerce Commission has practically turned over the decision of questions regarding the shipping or storage of explosives to the railroads of the country. Let me remark that if they deal with other questions affecting the rights between the public and the railroads, if for example they deal with questions of freight rates and other such problems that come up for discussion in the same way in which they have dealt with this, it would be far better to end the hypocrisy and abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission altogether. Instead let us supplicate the railroads directly.

In a case such as I have described, where enormous quantities of intensely inflammable explosives are heaped in enormous quantities or brought in enormous quantities to a community, we should provide that the local authorities shall prescribe and enforce the regulations and conditions under which the traffic shall be carried on. I am not discussing the question of whether or not we should put an embargo upon the sale of arms and ammunition. I am not dealing with that phase of the question at all, although on one side of it I entertain some very decided and unalterable convictions. I am just now calling to the attention of the House this entire matter and asking them to take it into consideration, so that when the bill which I will introduce comes up for passage, as I hope it will, they will be prepared to vote on it. I ask you to consider whether the lives of our people, the people of Jersey City and of the great city of New York, which pays one-tenth of the income tax of the country and in whose port two-thirds of the revenues that run the National Government are collected—whether those lives are to be kept in hourly peril of destruction in order that an arsenal might be constructed so that the bloody conflict which appalls the world and threatens the destruction of the white man's civilization in Europe may continue. I have faith in this Congress to rise to a recognition of its duty and to a determination to perform it. I believe you will think more of the safety of the Nation than that ammunition men should fatten their bank deposits and build prosperity on graves, and that when this bill comes before you you will give it speedy passage and thus remedy the unspeakable condition I have described. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the time of the gentleman for a couple of minutes in order that I may ask him a question or two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Dixon). The time of the gentleman has not yet expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman, he thinks the defect lies in the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission relies solely upon Col. Dunn as to the transportation of the explosives in that part of the country.

Mr. HAMILL. It does in fact, though in law it has the power of its own motion to enforce proper regulations.

Mr. ADAMSON. But the complaint is that they rely largely on Col. Dunn alone?

Mr. HAMILL. The complaint is that in this respect they have been inefficient, and they do not manifest a disposition to be otherwise.

Mr. ADAMSON. But the detail of the gentleman's specific suggestion is that they leave it to Col. Dunn?

Mr. HAMILL. Yes; they do, and the colonel is the representative of the railroads, and while he is an upright man, and I do not say he purposely decides in favor of the railroads, it unfortunately happens that the decisions run that way.

Mr. ADAMSON. As I understand the gentleman, the remedy that he proposes in his bill is to refer it to the local authorities by law instead of allowing the commission to rely on Col. Dunn?

Mr. HAMILL. Instead of allowing the commission to deal with a situation of that kind, as they claim they have a right to do—though I question their right in this extraordinary situation—I propose to specify clearly by statute that in cases where explosive ammunition is made for shipment abroad and not for the use of the United States Army, the local authorities shall say whether it shall come into a community or whether it shall stay out, and if it does come in under what regulations it shall be stored or allowed to be moved in transit.

Mr. ADAMSON. Under the gentleman's view of the situation—

Mr. HAMILL. I merely want to say that by ammunition I mean dynamite and high explosives and all those other products which are intensely dangerous and explosive.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman think that if the commission would cease to rely exclusively on Col. Dunn, and give to the matter that attention the gentleman thinks the commission ought to give to a subject, that they would meet the emergency and take care of the situation?

Mr. HAMILL. You might as well expect a suckling infant to do without its wet nurse as to expect the commission in this instance to do without Col. Dunn.

Mr. ADAMSON. What will they do—

Mr. HAMILL. These regulations are drawn by Col. Dunn. They are regulations covering the storage and transfer of explosives.

Mr. ADAMSON. What will they do when he dies?

Mr. HAMILL. I do not know, but there will be a desolation that will be heart-rending to contemplate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly willing to join with the gentleman, if he thinks it will meet the emergency, in persuading the commission to begin to train somebody else against the danger of Col. Dunn's death.

Mr. HAMILL. What I want, Judge ADAMSON—and I trust I may be allowed to break the rule by addressing the gentleman directly—is some effective legislation; and no doubt this bill will be referred to your committee and some proper way will be found to remedy this situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes—I ask that he may have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULBERT. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I merely want to call attention to this difficulty which the gentleman perhaps realizes he will encounter either in the committee or in this House, and that is that numerous propositions have in the past been made to localize the control of matters of interstate commerce, and they have not generally met with favor; and it may be they were not tried on the line of the gentleman's suggestion, which seems to be more reasonably likely to succeed than on a proposition to parcel out regulation and control by delegating it in any particular case to the local authorities.

Mr. HAMILL. I say this to the gentleman: That, of course, he knows that any bill discussed before his committee did not have to do with any such unprecedented situation. That may probably be an answer to his objection. However, let me say that what I want is some legislation to make the recurrence of the catastrophe of last Sunday impossible; and if the gentleman can suggest a better method than I have, I will most gladly and eagerly join with him.

Mr. ADAMSON. I appreciate that, and sympathize with the gentleman in his proposition; but this is the fact: Every community in this country in common rely upon this general agency to regulate their commerce, and if it is failing in this instance it might fail in the other instances; and it is to the interest of all of us to try to strengthen and improve the commission if it is not giving satisfaction in any part of the country.

Mr. HAMILL. I am very glad to hear the gentleman express those views. The commission ought to be strengthened. Something ought to be done with it.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILL. I will.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any conflict in jurisdiction between the police authorities of Jersey City and the police authorities of New York in respect to occurrences in the harbor of New York?

Mr. HAMILL. I understand there is no conflict in law and that there has been none in fact. I understand that by treaty between the two States Jersey City has jurisdiction for police purposes over the land; New York, instead of having authority as is the usual law to the middle of the stream, has police jurisdiction over all the waters and over crimes committed on boats, except where they are tied to the Jersey shore.

Mr. HULBERT. Precisely; in other words the legal situation as between New York and New Jersey in reference to what is termed the general harbor of New York, the port of New York, is that the State of New York has jurisdiction up to tidewater on the Jersey shore?

Mr. HAMILL. Police jurisdiction.

Mr. HULBERT. Police jurisdiction. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if he is familiar with the terms of what is known as the State marshal's fire law, passed by the Legislature of the State of New York in 1911, which was intended to cover this very situation with regard to munitions in New York Harbor? Under it a State fire marshal was appointed, and he was given complete jurisdiction and supervision over the storage and sale and distribution of cargoes of ammunition in the harbor of New York. That law would have prevented a catastrophe of this character, but that law was repealed by the present legislature of the State of New York on the theory of economy.

Mr. HAMILL. The information imparted to me by the gentleman is new, yet interesting. What I want to know is the purpose of the question. What is the purpose in the gentleman's mind in asking?

Mr. HULBERT. It was simply to bring to the gentleman's attention the provisions of this law and ask whether if the gentleman is able to secure the enactment of the bill of which he has given us a brief outline and the statute in question could be reenacted, we could get security from the State of New York which would protect the harbor of New York and those cities which border on the harbor of New York from catastrophes of this character?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall devote the time allotted to me to a discussion of the questions and issues bearing directly on the presidential campaign upon which we are now entering. It is not my purpose to discuss any pending bill or matter before the House.

The candidates have been nominated and platforms adopted, and we know now as well as we will ever know the lines on which the battle will be fought. I have been very much interested, in fact, amused, at the dilemma in which our opponents find themselves in their desperate but futile attempt to locate an issue upon which they dare risk the outcome. Recently in Illinois a newspaper sent out inquiries to all Republican papers throughout southern Illinois, among which was this question: "What will be the issues of the approaching campaign?" There were 57 replies received to this inquiry, expressing various opinions, and there were just 57 distinct and separate varieties. No two papers agreed upon the same issue. Upon reading the Chicago platform, one can readily understand the embarrassment occasioned by this question propounded to these editors, when all the assembled wisdom of the Republican Party was unable to discover or present to the people in a party platform a single concrete issue upon which they can hope to challenge the attention of the public and base a successful campaign.

Recently there appeared an editorial in the Washington Post, a Republican paper, entitled "What are the issues?" In this editorial it is said:

There must be one or two big issues, preferably one, which will attract the attention of the country and induce it to vote the Democrats out of power. Until Mr. Hughes makes his acceptance speech the country will not know upon what target he will direct his fire. Will it be upon Mexico or the handling of the submarine situation; upon the tariff or upon some other domestic problem?

I had always supposed existing conditions make issues, and that issues could not be improvised or manufactured for the occasion. But it seems in this case, according to the Post, that the delectable privilege devolved on Mr. Hughes to manufacture an issue, and that the country was required to await Mr. Hughes's pleasure, not only in discovering but in advising the Republican Party what the issues of the campaign would be. Ordinarily we would have recourse to the opposition platform for the issues, and what arguments will be advanced or assigned as a reason for a change of administration; but we read the Republican platform this year in vain in an effort to locate an issue, and Candidate Hughes manifestly found himself embarrassed for a source of inspiration.

Now that Mr. Hughes has spoken, we know about as much as we knew before. The mountain labored, and gave forth a mouse. His "masterly effort" is the cheap production of an overcharged candidate, who bartered a place on the Supreme Bench for the empty honor of a Republican nomination for President. That which is expected and long heralded oftentimes proves disappointing, and if Democrats are amused and gratified at the total failure of the Republican candidate, upon whom devolved the great and responsible task of giving birth to an issue, to come across with something resembling an issue upon which a campaign could be prosecuted with respect and dignity becoming a one-time great political organization, what must be the chagrin and mortification of those who with anxious hearts, earnest expectation, and fervent hope looked forward to a new prophet to lead them from the darkness into the light, and point the way to the promised land and lead them again to the pie counter! Almost the only issue I have been able to discover, and I think I have diagnosed the case fairly well, is Pie, Plums, and Pork v. Peace, Prosperity, and Preparedness. Upon this issue we confidently go before the country with assurance of Democratic victory.

Three-fourths of Mr. Hughes's speech of acceptance is devoted to our foreign relations, and incidentally to the question of preparedness. The remaining fourth is devoted to domestic questions, and amounts to a ratification of the accomplishments of the present administration. The Mexican policy comes in for a third of the space and time occupied, and is a strained, labored, and far-fetched effort to create an issue by marshaling trivial and incidental matters, and attempting to manufacture a mountain out of a mole hill. To me it is a sad spectacle to witness the example of one at least reputed to be great, whatever the fact may be, who so recently and until he became imbued with political ambition occupied a place on the highest tribunal in the land, attempting to play politics in discussing questions of state about which he knows so little, and playing the part of a pettifogger in attempting to deceive and mislead the public, and to fabricate issues without basis or foundation. I could understand why a Justice of the Supreme Court might feel called upon to resign his high place and offer himself a sacrifice to a political cause where conditions warranted and his country called, but I can not understand the motives that actuate one who would leave that high station and become a mere instrument of a party in an effort to create fictitious issues upon which to restore a party to pelf and power. The evident purpose and intent of Mr. Hughes's speech is to deceive, mislead, and create prejudices and arouse sentiment against the present administration, without regard to the merits or demerits of the case. He sympathizes with the old assassin, Huerta, and criticizes and condemns Mr. Wilson because he did not defile the spirit of American institutions by the recognition of one who exercised the functions of President of the Mexican Republic by virtue of the most cold blooded, heinous, and abhorrent crime known to the modern world, and attributes the present difficulties in Mexico to the refusal of the President to take Huerta to his bosom and welcome him and his administration within the sisterhood of American States. It is fair to presume that Mr. Hughes, if President, would have done that which he condemns Mr. Wilson for not doing, and if that in public estimation constitutes an issue, we welcome it. I am persuaded that the American people are interested more in what will occur in Mexico in the future than in what has already happened, and will hardly appreciate as an issue a past incident in which they have so little concern.

Mr. Hughes criticizes the landing at Vera Cruz and utterly condemns the administration for withdrawing without compelling a salute to the American flag, without restoring order in that distracted country, and without maintaining a government by force. In other words, Mr. Hughes would have had war and not peace; he would have pursued the course of the aggressor, the high-handed intruder, the invader, and the subjugator, and would have refused, I presume, to submit the questions then in controversy between Mexico and the United States to the representatives of the three great Latin-American Republics, who adjusted the difficulties and deferred, if not avoided, an open break and rupture between the two countries. If the Vera Cruz incident, which is past, constitutes in the public estimation an issue upon which a great presidential election shall turn, we welcome the issue.

Mr. Hughes criticizes the Wilson administration for its failure "to perform its obvious duty to secure protection for the lives and property of our citizens," and says:

It is most unworthy to slur those who have investments in Mexico in order to escape condemnation for the nonperformance of this duty.

Who are those who have investments in Mexico for whom Mr. Hughes's heart bleeds, and whose unprotected rights appeal so strongly to his emotion? They are the Falls and the Hearsts, and the hundred and one American adventurers and capitalists who have taken their chances and are engaged in exploiting the resources of Mexico, and who would have the United States intervene for the enhancement of the value of their investments. They are the men who have created a sentiment in this country in favor of intervention and who condemn the President because he has not openly declared war, or that which is equivalent—armed intervention—for the restoration of order and the so-called protection of the rights of these selfsame individuals. Last year I was traveling in California, and I engaged in conversation on a train with one of these American capitalists who had money invested in a large mining enterprise in Sonora. He was severe in his criticism of President Wilson because he had not forcibly intervened, and assigned as a reason the fact that he and his associates had had to virtually abandon their mining enterprise for the want of adequate protection. He told me that they had several hundred men employed, and that they had to operate their mines virtually under arms, and that their profits were greatly curtailed by reason of the inconvenience and expense occasioned thereby. I asked him if he could not have continued to protect his property and operate his mine, and he said he could have done so but it would have been attended with some risk, and for that reason they had shut down and moved out, and he thought it the duty of the administration to send an army down there for the assertion of his rights and the protection of his property. I said to him, "You abandoned your property because there was some risk attendant upon its operation, because possibly your life was jeopardized if you remained there to conduct it, and yet you say that the President should have sent the youth of America, my friends' and neighbors' boys, down there to hazard their lives for that for which you would not risk your own." This is the class of individuals who have investments in Mexico, and for whom Mr. Hughes's heart bleeds so profusely. If this be considered an issue, if the failure to protect the lives and property of high-handed adventurers and exploiters of a foreign people constitutes an issue in American politics, we welcome the issue.

Mr. Hughes in one line criticizes the administration for placing an embargo on the export of munitions of war to Mexico, and in the same paragraph condemns the President for modifying that order and permitting munitions to be supplied to the de facto government, and has not the temerity or courage to say which he would have done under like circumstances or which he will do in the future in the event he should be empowered with the authority to act. He finds fault with both sides of the transaction and leaves the public to guess which course he would have pursued.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. In just a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Yes; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. HILL. I ask the question, not with any idea of embarrassing the gentleman or criticizing the line of his argument. I think the question is an important one. What have we to do in the future with reference to the action of our mercantile establishments which, under the pending bill, which is before the Committee on the Judiciary and which was recommended by the Federal Trade Commission, authorizes action with reference to foreign countries, with reference to banks which are authorized to be established in foreign countries? Are we to abandon them and leave them unprotected on foreign shores? It is a great question. We authorize the establishment of branch banks in all the countries of the world, and merchants and financiers and bankers are invited to establish branches in foreign countries. Must we abandon them?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. In reply to the gentleman's question, I will say that we must treat Mexico as any other foreign country, however unstable the Government may be; just as we would look to England or Germany for the security of our citizens there, and hold them responsible for the protection of our rights. We will have an accounting with Mexico some day, as we will have with England and any other foreign Government which has infringed our rights.

Mr. HILL. Then American citizens under these circumstances would be very chary about carrying American enterprises into foreign countries.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I should presume a prudent American citizen would be very chary about carrying his business into Mexico until they have a stable government there.

Hand in hand with his criticism of the President for his failure to take Huerta to his bosom Mr. Hughes castigates the administration for recognizing Carranza, who secured his position as de facto President, not by murder, not by assassination, not by intrigue, not by crime, but by virtue of the will of the Mexican people in so far as the election machinery of that country permitted their will to be recorded, and who was the only authority after Huerta abdicated, or was driven from power by the lashes of Mr. Wilson, who could exercise governmental functions and enforce and protect international obligations. Why does Mr. Hughes execrate Carranza and extol Huerta, except it be to take issue with the President?

Mr. Hughes grows pathetic when he refers to the fact that the entire National Guard has been ordered out and many thousands of our citizens have been taken from their peaceful employment and hurried to the Mexican border, and at the same time demands from Mexico the protection of the lives and the property of our citizens and the security of our border from depredation. Just how he reconciles his disagreement with the President over sending the National Guard to the border for the protection of our territory against bandit incursions with the declaration that we demand from Mexico the protection of the lives and property of our citizens and the security of our border from depredations, I am at a loss to understand. What does he mean—that he would have declined to send the National Guard to protect the border and left our citizens on the border defenseless against marauders and irresponsible bandits, or would he have done just as Mr. Wilson has done, send all available Regulars and the National Guard for the defense of the lives and property of American citizens and the protection of American soil from hostile invasion? And what does he mean when he says, "We demand from Mexico the protection of the lives and property of our citizens and the security of our border from depredations"? Does he mean war? What else can he mean? Wilson has maintained peace with Mexico first by submitting the questions in dispute at the time of the occupancy of Vera Cruz to representatives of Latin American Republics and now by diplomatic negotiations, which promise a successful outcome and the speedy return of our National Guard to their homes and their families. There was and is but one other course open, and when Mr. Hughes takes issue with President Wilson it must be that he would have pursued, and if President would now pursue, a different course and by forcible intervention, war, have enforced the protection of the rights which he says we demand.

Why was not Mr. Hughes open and frank with the American people? Why does he not take them into his confidence and say just what he means, what he would have done or would do under like circumstances? Why does he leave so much to inference and convey so little by implication? If such indifferent, uncertain, inferential, deceptive, and misleading attitude constitutes an issue in American politics, we welcome the issue.

I can tell you what it all means. There is but one alternative. It is peace or war. It is Mr. Wilson's policy of peace or Mr. Hughes's policy of war. Hughes had not the courage to say what he means; but there is but one conclusion, and that is the reverse of what Mr. Wilson has done and the reverse of what he has accomplished. Mr. Hughes means war with Mexico under the guise of protecting the lives and property of Americans who are exploiting that country. He means just what "Uncle Joe" CANNON means in his recent contribution to the New York Independent, except he has not the courage of "Uncle Joe" and is too delicate in his machinery or too fearful of the consequences to say so. "Uncle Joe" said:

If I had supreme power I would go into Mexico not as an excuse. I would go into Mexico and have the manhood to say that we can not have permanent peace, that you can not be protected in Mexico, that we can not be protected in the United States, until there is set up in Mexico a government, a military government, a government of force to start with; and then, after setting up a government of that kind, let it be administered until a Mexican is found who is strong enough to maintain order in that country.

Mr. Hughes further says:

I think it little short of absurd that we should be compelled to call men from their shops and factories and offices and their professions for such a purpose.

I would ask Mr. Hughes, I will ask his sponsors on this floor, I will ask the Republican press of the country, which is working overtime trying to pump up a little enthusiasm as the ostensible result of Mr. Hughes's great speech, where would he get the men in these prosperous times, in this Democratic epoch, except from the shops, the factories, the offices, and the professions? Would he summon the idle farm hand and the loafer on the streets? And if he means that he would rely on the Regulars, I will ask somebody who stands sponsor for him where he would procure his Regulars? He evidently forgot when he uttered that phrase that he is living in an era of Democratic supremacy and wholesome prosperity and was carried back in his mind to the days when Republicans were in power and soup houses flourished, when the empty dinner pail dangled in the faces of ragged mothers and starving children. He evidently forgot that we now live at a time when we not only have a full dinner pail, but a full market basket, a full stomach, and a full purse [applause on the Democratic side], and that there is no source of supply to recruit the militia or the Regulars except from the farm, the factory, the workshop, the offices, and the professions.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask my colleague if he approves the course of the President in sending the fleet and landing the Marines in Vera Cruz in order to obtain a salute to the flag of a certain number of shots?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I would have preferred that my colleague had raised that question when I was discussing that phase of the case. But I will say that the fleet was not sent there to demand a salute, and it was not retained there for that purpose. It was sent there and remained there to enforce the just rights of our country, and it remained there until the intervention of the South American Republics, who proposed to arbitrate the matter and peacefully adjust the questions in dispute.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman understand that the South American diplomats did arbitrate the matter and settle the dispute?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Yes. They were in session at Niagara Falls for weeks, and did settle the matter to the satisfaction of both countries.

Mr. DENISON. Will my colleague tell me where we can find the results of that arbitration?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I assume it is a matter of record in the State Department.

Mr. DENISON. Will my colleague define what it was?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I do not recall now just the form of the questions presented to the arbitrators for settlement. It involved the question of the withdrawal of the American troops from Vera Cruz, and the assurance upon the part of the Mexican Republic that it was not only able to, but would, maintain peace and protect the rights of foreigners.

Again, Mr. Hughes criticizes the President for "being stronger in words than in deeds." Words are the precursor, the harbinger of peace; deeds of war. There is no last word between friends, but when deeds take the place of words war is the inevitable consequence. He says the present administration "has been too much disposed to be content with leisurely discussion." There is no disguising the thought in Mr. Hughes's mind. He hedges, he sidesteps, he trims, he equivocates; he breathes the spirit of war and professes to love peace; he dangles armed intervention before the Mexican exploiter, and holds out the olive branch of peace to tempt the vision of the peace-loving mothers of the land, and imagines that he is fooling the people. Such dope deceives no one. I have too much confidence in the wisdom, the good sense, and the integrity of the American voter to believe that he can be caught by chaff, by claptrap, such as indulged in by this erstwhile justice—"just-ice."

The most amusing part of Mr. Hughes's remarkable production is the veiled, disguised, and timid allusion to the foreign influences which have operated to violate international law and to place our country in an unneutral position with relation to the European war. He timidly, delicately, and reluctantly refers to the plots and conspiracies in the interest of a foreign nation. He had to say something on this question in order to satisfy the inveterate Teddy, who had labeled him "my candidate," and who sat in a near-by box and acknowledged a loving salute. Mr. Hughes approaches this momentous question with a delicacy unbecoming the candidate of a great political party for President. I wonder how his "pussy footing" appeals to the imagination of the robust Teddy, whose vigorous thrusts always hit the bull's-eye. Mr. Hughes's handling of this question is a sly, a cunning bid for the German-American vote, but I apprehend is too raw to deceive or mislead one of them.

He had to take a fall out with the administration, however, on this question, and uses this significant phrase:

As soon as the administration had notice of plots and conspiracies it was its duty to stop them. It was not lacking in resources. Its responsibility for their continuance can not be escaped by the condemnation of others.

By "others" I presume he means those who were engaged in these nefarious practices, whom Mr. Wilson so emphatically condemned in a recent message to Congress. I call attention to the fact that these plots and conspiracies were stopped. It took some time to ferret out and locate the influences behind them and to rid our country of those foreign representatives who were promoting them, but they were stopped. There is no well-grounded suspicion, I hope, that the recent deplorable explosion on the Jersey shore opposite the city of New York was the result of a plot or conspiracy in the interest of any foreign nation.

If Mr. Hughes means by this part of his speech to present an issue to the American people in this campaign between America and Americanism on the one side and foreign influences and conspiracies, depredations, and crime against our country and our flag, we welcome the issue, and are ready to submit our case to the great American jury. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But why does he not say what he means? Why does he carp and criticize and find fault without indicating what course he would pursue under like circumstances, whether he would tolerate foreign representatives who under the protection of the American flag were plotting and scheming and contriving to violate international law and drag our country into war, or whether he would have done as Mr. Wilson has done, give them their passports, and give notice to the world that no divided allegiance can be tolerated beneath the American flag, but that all who profess citizenship, enjoy the benefits of American institutions, and profit by the protection of the American flag must respect and obey the laws of this country, honor its flag, and promote its material and spiritual welfare, or get out? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Incidentally, and in connection with the foreign policy of this Government, to which subject Mr. Hughes devoted such a large part of his remarkable speech, he discusses the question of preparedness, and arrogates unto the Republican Party and to the invincible Teddy, all credit for the discovery of this important question, and issues to the Republican Party letters patent. He says: "It is apparent that we are shockingly unprepared." We are, but who is responsible for it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The greatest, the busiest, and most successful administration since the lamented Lincoln conducted to a successful issue the great Civil War has had but three years within which to construct new legislation and carry out the reforms demanded by the people, and to undo the wrongs, retrace the steps, and remove the rocks which wrecked the Republican Party. There is, and can be, no cause for complaint that this administration has not within the brief period of three years created a great military and naval establishment, adequate to contend with the great nations of Europe, which have for a quarter of a century devoted their whole resources to the building up of a military establishment in preparation for the very war in which they are now engaged. If we are shockingly unprepared, who is to blame? For 16 years the Republican Party was in the absolute and undisputed control of every branch of the Federal Government. When the present administration came in we had less than 90,000 men in the Regular Army, and our Navy had been relegated from second to fourth place among the navies of the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an extension of 15 minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, without objecting, I merely wish to say we have two or more hours of speeches and we want to pass some bills.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. This is the first opportunity I have taken to address the House for some time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. It is not possible to reconcile the extravagant declarations of Mr. Hughes for a great military establishment with the characteristic and evidently insincere declaration that "we should not have found it difficult (during the submarine controversy and other foreign complications) to maintain peace, but we should have maintained peace with honor. During this critical period the only danger of war has lain in the weak course of the administration." This is the first assertion from high authority to which my attention has been directed that the President's policy created the only danger of war which has confronted us the last two years. Mr. Bryan resigned from the Cabinet because he regarded Mr. Wilson's attitude as too severe and calculated to involve us in war with Germany. To say that it was not difficult to maintain peace is to belie the fact and insult the intelligence of the American people, who trembled for months on the brink of war, and to say that the course of the administration was weak is to speak without regard to the truth and to invite a challenge of his honesty, for the world knows that nothing but the resolute and determined policy of Mr. Wilson brought to terms in the submarine controversy, without bloodshed, the greatest and most powerful people, and the most arrogant and defiant ruler the world has known. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And with the manifest purpose of further discrediting Mr. Wilson and depriving him of the credit to which he is justly entitled, and the belittling the success of this administration in maintaining peace, Mr. Hughes again remarks, in speaking of the Mexican situation and the sending of the National Guard to protect our border, that "the exigency, comparatively speaking, was not a very grave one." At the same time, and in almost the same breath, Mr. Hughes deprecates our unpreparedness and the fact that a show of strength and resolute purpose would have avoided the Mexican situation.

There is a lack of consistency, a want of sincerity, a manifest purpose to deceive, a spirit of demagoguery, an assumption of superiority, an extravagant, inconsistent, and irresponsible assertion and import running through every phrase and line of Mr. Hughes's speech, an analysis of which is all that is necessary to convince the thinking that after all he is but a politician, seeking political preferment at any cost.

There is no room for an issue on the question of preparedness unless it be that Mr. Hughes takes issue with this administration because of its big naval program. Mr. Hughes demands a great standing army and belittles the administration's naval program, when everyone with an ounce of brains knows that with a large navy sufficient to protect our coast and intercept the enemy at sea and prevent their securing a foothold on our soil, we have no use for a large army, except to protect the border and suppress insurrection, labor riots, and strikes. It is evidently for the latter purpose that Mr. Hughes would erect a great military establishment and quarter a large standing army on the American people. He inferentially criticizes the administration's preparedness program, but does not dare, and has not the courage to take direct issue. With characteristic evasion, Candidate Hughes employs this indefinite language, leaving it to inference and doubtful construction as to the kind of military service which he favors: "I believe that the first citizen reserve subject to call should be enlisted as a Federal army, and trained under Federal authority." Just what does he mean? Does he favor compulsory service and universal military training? Why does he not take the people into his confidence and frankly tell them just where he stands? If he intends to be fair, if he is not playing politics, why does he imply everything and say nothing? If honest, why does he so phrase his declaration that it may be variously construed to suit the particular whim of each individual reader? Mr. Hughes is a lawyer, is said to be a good lawyer, and knows what implication, what inference, what doubtful construction means and the inestimable advantage in being able to subsequently construe and explain his words so as to conform to any attitude he may assume or policy he may adopt.

In this connection I desire to invite attention to the administration's preparedness program, as the same is pending in conference. The appropriations for preparedness, as they now stand, are as follows:

Army	$313,970,447.10
Navy	315,826,843.55
Fortifications	25,748,050.00
Military Academy	2,238,328.57
Army and Navy deficiency	27,559,348.05
Total	685,343,017.27

This enormous amount ought to satisfy the demands of the most exacting, and no doubt is accepted by Mr. Hughes with mental reservations and regret, but he is not fair enough, he has not the courage to approve it while indulging his criticism of the administration, to whom no credit attaches, in his mind, and for which he has not a kind word.

Finally, after six columns of words, Mr. Hughes ventures to briefly discuss domestic affairs and informs the public that we are living in a fool's paradise. I admit that this is paradise and that there are some people living in it who do not vote the Democratic ticket. He says:

The temporary prosperity to which our opponents point has been created by the abnormal conditions incident to the war.

I have heard before from high Republican authority, I have heard it said on this floor, that our prosperity is only temporary, and I sometimes think that the wish is father to the thought, and that there are Republicans so devoid of patriotism, so obsessed with the desire for Republican supremacy that they would gladly know that at the close of the European war a collapse would follow and that destitution and want would stalk throughout the land. I can not believe that the picture drawn by Candidate Hughes of conditions that will follow a rejuvenated Europe can be anticipated within many years. It will take a generation to restore the waste of war and to reinstate Europe to the position she formerly occupied in the industrial world. Millions of her best men, the youth and flower of her people, have been killed in battle and died of disease and other millions maimed and crippled for life. It will be with them a struggle for existence, and I do not apprehend that the warring nations will be rivals in the world's markets for years to come.

It is a mistake to assume, as Mr. Hughes does, that munitions have been the great source of revenue and constitute any considerable part of our trade with foreign nations. The export of munitions of war constitutes but 10 per cent of our foreign trade, and the suspension of this trade at the close of the war will scarcely create a ripple in the industrial world. The number of men engaged in the manufacture of munitions is a very small per cent of all the men engaged in industrial pursuits, and can readily find employment at remunerative wages in other lines. Mr. Hughes and his associates know and feel the influence that prosperity, which abounds on every hand, will have on the approaching election, and seek to offset it by sounding a false alarm. They know that labor is employed at the highest wages ever known and entirely content with its lot. Labor wants no change. They know that industrial enterprise is reaping greater profits than at any time before in the history of the country and that capital and industry are content with conditions as they are and want no change. They know that agriculture was never more profitable and that domestic trade and commerce is abundantly awarded and want no change. The alarm sounded by the Republican candidate that a protective tariff is necessary for the preservation of American manufactures has no lure for them. They realize that the Underwood tariff law now in operation has been a great success and has produced revenue in excess of the most sanguine expectations of its friends; that under its operation the Treasury of the United States has a surplus never exceeded but once in the history of the country and that our export trade has multiplied many fold; that profits were never greater and that legitimate fortunes were never amassed with as little effort.

Will Mr. Hughes, or some one sponsor for him, explain how it is that the bank deposits of Oklahoma, where no munitions are manufactured, have increased 100 per cent since 1912?

Will some Republican spellbinder kindly explain how 57 per cent increase in building improvements in the Northwest this year is due to the European war? There have been three billion increase in bank resources since 1912. Will some one explain how this enormous increase in bank resources is due to a protective tariff?

The American farmer produced in three years of the present Democratic administration a yearly income $1,000,000,000 greater than under the preceding Republican administration. Will some one explain why this is so and on what theory he expects to turn the farmer vote against Mr. Wilson?

There have been 187 wage increases in 34 States to the army of mechanics engaged in the building trades. Every dollar they earn is for America's permanent improvement. Will some one please explain what the European war has to do with the building of homes in the United States?

In four weeks, ending July 8, the Textile World Journal reports 100 new mills, and 135 expansions in prospect. American textile manufacturers are now shouting "The world is our market." The greatest volume of textile exports under the Republican Payne-Aldrich tariff, in 1913, was $60,000,000; under the free wool schedule of the present Democratic tariff exports of woolen goods alone rose from $4,000,000 to $54,000,000, while total textile exports exceeded $170,000,000.

Will Mr. Hughes explain, if American prosperity is due to the war munitions output, why bank deposits in the Central West and Northwest have increased 50 per cent, while Delaware, where the Du Pont Powder Works are located, is the only State in the Union showing a decrease in bank deposits in the past four years?

Mr. Hughes declares for a tariff commission, with complete power to gather and compile information for the use of Congress in all matters relating to the tariff. The Democratic and Republican platforms declare in favor of a tariff commission, and the House, since the adjournment of both conventions, has passed a law creating a tariff commission, which will soon pass the Senate and become a law, and according to Republican theory and professions heretofore made, the tariff as a political issue is removed from politics and can not enter into the consideration of the voters in arriving at their choice of candidates and parties in the coming election. It is for this reason I assume that Candidate Hughes devoted so little space to this question which in all former campaigns has constituted the one great question about which the lines of battle were drawn. It is refreshing to know that at last the tariff is removed from the political arena, and that henceforth it may be treated as a business proposition, and that tariff schedules may in the future be changed without friction or business disturbance upon the recommendation of the tariff commission, and adjusted to suit varying conditions from time to time without resorting to a general revision, which always disturbs business and unsettles trade.

The remainder of Mr. Hughes's speech consists in an affirmation, or ratification, rather, of Democratic legislation. He advocates the building of a merchant marine, which has been destroyed under Republican rule, and which is about to be restored by the ship-purchase bill, which recently passed the House, and promises certain to pass the Senate and become a law.

He makes the assertion that "We have determined to cut out root and branch monopolistic practices." Many will look upon a declaration of that character from a Republican source with much suspicion and misgiving, but in view of the fact that by the provisions of the Clayton antitrust law, we have already restrained monopoly and curbed the trusts, the most we can credit to Mr. Hughes is an unintentional ratification of Democratic legislation to this end. He declares himself for it because it is an assured fact and meets a popular expectation and demand.

He declares for the regulation of our transportation system, and the development and expansion of transportation facilities, which has already been adequately provided for by a Democratic Congress. He is rather late in his pronouncement but, no doubt, concluded it to be the popular thing to do.

He declares in favor of "The conservation of the just interests of labor," which has been so adequately safe-guarded by Democratic legislation. He favors an adequate Federal workman's compensation law, and in fact, unwittingly indorses the workman's compensation law which recently passed the House, and is now pending in the Senate.

The professions and pretenses in favor of labor are in direct contrast with the record of Candidate Hughes, who, when Governor of the State of New York, vetoed the two-cent fare bill and the workman's eight-hour law.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is not his present record in contradiction to what his record was when he wrote the decision in the Danbury Hatters' case?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Yes; it is. I regret I have not the time to discuss the legal phases of that case. The Danbury Hatters' case involved the question of a boycott, in which Justice Hughes concurred in the opinion imposing or sustaining an enormous fine against a number of workmen for refusing to patronize and interfering with the trade of a nonunion shop, which operated to deprive them of the very roofs above their heads. There were 186 defendants, all union men, and a fine imposed against them of $300,000. The Federation of Labor issued an appeal to labor and has succeeded in raising by contribution about one-half the amount of the fine in an effort to enable them to save their homes.

Mr. Hughes also declares for an "effective system of rural credits and the wise conservation of our natural resources," both of which have been provided for by recent legislation. It is indeed strange that Mr. Hughes, until he became a candidate for President and found that his opponent had preempted the field and attached to himself great credit for all this beneficent legislation so long sought by the country and for 16 years deferred by the Republican Party, had not discovered any merit in the just demands of labor, of agriculture, and of business for this necessary and wholesome legislation, and that for the first time a Republican candidate is found approving constructive legislation of this character.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Do you think he has any show of being elected?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. You mean President Wilson?

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; I mean Mr. Hughes.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I do not think he has the least show in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know my colleague would not expect any other answer, knowing that he is informed as to the conditions.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Has he any show of carrying your district?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I have no district. I represent my State at large, but he will be beaten in the district in which I live by 10,000, and I am free to say that Illinois will line up again in the Democratic column and cast its electoral vote for Mr. Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Would my colleague advise me to warn Mr. Hughes to withdraw?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Well, I would prefer that the gentleman not do that. I fear you might nominate somebody who could give us a race. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have carefully analyzed Mr. Hughes's long-heralded effort with the hope of finding some great, tangible, lucid, concrete issue that would challenge the attention of the country, but have looked in vain. In nine days what Mr. Hughes has said in his desperate attempt to create a fictitious issue will be forgotten and the minds of the people will revert to the accomplishments of this administration and rejoice in the assurance that preparedness is an accomplished fact, that unexcelled prosperity abounds throughout the land, and that peace, under the wise diplomacy of President Wilson, is the inheritance of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. This being Calendar Wednesday, is it in order to call the committees?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that there was an agreement as to the speeches that were to be delivered this afternoon, and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] was to be recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] secured his consent subject to our bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure but what the time to raise the question whether the committees should be called on Calendar Wednesday has already passed. It is true that when I asked unanimous consent to speak this afternoon I agreed that if the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were ready to present their bill I would yield for that purpose, and if the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce wants to bring up a public measure I would let him precede the special order.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that was confined to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; it was confined to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I made the inquiry about reaching the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They could not be reached until another committee was called.

Mr. BORLAND. That was the substance of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his affability, though it is not entirely applicable to this case; but it shows that if the occasion arose he would be clever. It is never too late to make the point that this is Calendar Wednesday. It is very customary here to let some other things be taken up by unanimous consent before we go to the call of committees on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] whether it would be agreeable to him to let his speech go over until Friday, if we do not have time for it after disposing of two or three bills this afternoon? I do not want to interfere with the gentleman's speech.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, that would be perfectly agreeable to me, but it would not be agreeable to me to have other speeches precede mine.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think the gentleman's speech will be the unfinished business on Friday morning.

Mr. BORLAND. When I found to-day that another speech, by unanimous consent, was to precede mine, it seemed to me that that was not quite the spirit of the understanding.

Mr. MANN. That was a little different matter, on account of the emergency caused by the explosions over at New York.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to be heard in his turn, like everybody else, and not in any other way.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will have consent to speak, but Calendar Wednesday comes seldom these days, and there are one or two things that ought to be disposed of.

Mr. BORLAND. It is perfectly manifest that if there is any public business before the House the House ought to consider it.

The SPEAKER. This is the way of it: Of course, this is Calendar Wednesday, and ordinarily the committees would be called, but the House made a unanimous-consent order that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] should have one hour—

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I beg the Chair's pardon. The RECORD shows that he agreed to follow the bills that I might want to call up. He admits that.

The SPEAKER. Does the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee come first on the call?

Mr. ADAMSON. Very nearly. I understand there is one other matter that comes first.

Mr. MANN. There is one other bill that comes ahead of it. The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman from Missouri would read what the RECORD shows.

Mr. BORLAND. I will refer the Speaker to what was said.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Missouri admits that we had that understanding, without looking up the RECORD. It is very painful to me to try to insist on calling up our bill instead of letting the gentleman speak now.

Mr. BORLAND. It is very painful to me to insist on speaking. We might as well straighten it out. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD is as follows:

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Wednesday, after the special orders that have already been made, I may address the House for one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, after the special order is disposed of, he be allowed to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the gentleman addressing the House. A number of gentlemen on this side want opportunity to address the House at an early date, but it is quite possible that on Wednesday the House may want to consider some bills on the Wednesday Calendar from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. If it is done, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] desires to proceed.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not want to interfere with anything that comes up before the House that the House desires to consider in the ordinary course of its business.

So I had no objection to the bill from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, because I felt that the agreement was clearly to that effect, but my place on the calendar, I think, is subject only to that agreement.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not look at it quite in that way, because the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures precedes the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There is a bill that I think will take only a moment—

Mr. BORLAND. It might be like the lime bill.

Mr. MANN. It might, that is true.

Mr. ADAMSON. If so, our committee will be knocked out, too.

The SPEAKER. In order to give the gentleman from Georgia the right to get in ahead of everybody else on this call of committees he would have to get unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois thinks that the only remaining bill ahead of our committee will require only a moment or two to dispose of. I am perfectly willing to have the calendar called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, from the excerpt that the gentleman from Missouri read, he will have to wait until the gentleman from Georgia has disposed of his bill. The Clerk will call the first committee.

Mr. MANN. I think it is perfectly safe to let the gentleman from Missouri go ahead and take up the bills after he gets through.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Missouri is perfectly willing to wait.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask that that be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they do not want to be passed without prejudice.

The Clerk called the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

BASKETS FOR FRUITS, ETC.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 17058.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman authorized by his committee to call it up?

Mr. REAVIS. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17058) to fix standards for Climax baskets for grapes and other fruits and vegetables, and to fix standards for baskets and other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That standards for Climax baskets for grapes and other fruits and vegetables shall be the 2-quart basket, 4-quart basket, and 12-quart basket, respectively:

(a) The standard 2-quart Climax basket shall be of the following dimensions: Length of bottom piece, 9½ inches; width of bottom piece, 3½ inches; thickness of bottom piece, three-eighths of an inch; height of basket, 3½ inches, outside measurement; top of basket, length 11 inches and width 5 inches, outside measurement. Basket to have a cover 5 by 11 inches, when a cover is used.

(b) The standard 4-quart Climax basket shall be of the following dimensions: Length of bottom piece, 12 inches; width of bottom piece, 4½ inches; thickness of bottom piece, three-eighths of an inch; height of basket, 4½ inches, outside measurement; top of basket, length 14 inches, width 6½ inches, outside measurement. Basket to have cover 6½ inches by 14 inches, when cover is used.

(c) The standard 12-quart Climax basket shall be of the following dimensions: Length of bottom piece, 16 inches; width of bottom piece, 6½ inches; thickness of bottom piece, seven-sixteenths of an inch; height of basket, 7½ inches, outside measurement; top of basket, length 19 inches, width 9 inches, outside measurement. Basket to have cover 9 inches by 19 inches, when cover is used.

Sec. 2. That the standard basket or other container for small fruits, berries, and vegetables shall be of the following capacities, namely, dry one-half pint, dry pint, dry quart, or multiples of the dry quart.

(a) The dry half pint shall contain 16.8 cubic inches.

(b) The dry pint shall contain 33.6 cubic inches.

(c) The dry quart shall contain 67.2 cubic inches.

Sec. 3. That it shall be unlawful to manufacture for shipment, or to sell for shipment, or to ship from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, any Climax basket or other containers for small fruits, berries, or vegetables, whether filled or unfilled, which do not conform to the provisions of this act; and any person guilty of a willful violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $25: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to the manufacture, sale, or shipment of Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables when intended for export to foreign countries when such Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables accord with the specifications of the foreign purchasers or comply with the law of the country to which shipment is made or to be made.

Sec. 4. That the examination and test of Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables, for the purpose of determining whether such baskets or other containers comply with the provisions of this act, shall be made by the Department of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish and promulgate rules and regulations allowing such reasonable tolerances and variations as may be found necessary.

Sec. 5. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney, to whom satisfactory evidence of any violation of the act is presented, to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper court of the United States for the enforcement of the penalties as in such case herein provided.

Sec. 6. That no dealer shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this act when he can establish a guaranty signed by the manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, or other party residing within the United States from whom such Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers, as defined in this act, were purchased, to the effect that said Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers are correct within the meaning of this act. Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers to such dealer, and in such case said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach in due course to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after the 1st day of November, 1917.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, Mr. ASHBROOK, of Ohio, he directed me to call the bill up. It will take but a word to explain the purpose of it. There are two characters of containers provided for in the bill; one is known as the Climax basket, which is a general trade name for a special character of basket. The other is for containers used for the purpose of shipping berries and other small fruits. Certain dealers in grapes have been cutting down the size of the Climax basket, giving to the purchaser less than he presumed he was purchasing. The purpose of the bill is to fix a standard size for that basket so as to prevent further deception.

The berry trade is presumably being done by the dry quart and fractions of the dry quart. A wine or fluid quart contains about one-third less than the dry quart, and many berry dealers are now disposing of berries in the wine quart, representing it to be the dry quart. The bill fixes the dry quart and multiples or fractions of the dry quart as the standard container for berries. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. DILLON. What is the necessity of using the word "Climax"? Does it represent a trade-mark, and why should it not be eliminated from the bill?

Mr. REAVIS. If you eliminate the word "Climax" you destroy the bill. The Climax basket is a world-known trade name given to a certain character of basket known everywhere as the Climax basket. Certain dealers are selling grapes in so-called Climax baskets which are of less size than the basket known to the trade as Climax baskets. We are fixing the standard size for the Climax basket. If you eliminate the word "Climax" you destroy the bill.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman will observe that the dimensions of the basket are given—that is, the inches, length and width. Would not that fix the contents without the use of the word "Climax," which is simply a trade-mark?

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman is mistaken in thinking that the word "Climax" is a trade-mark. It is made by all basket manufacturers throughout the country. It is merely a name by which the trade recognizes a certain basket. We are fixing the capacity of that basket.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. The penalty feature contained in section 3 is intended to cover the standard basket and other containers for small fruits and berries and vegetables mentioned in section 2, is it?

Mr. REAVIS. It is intended to cover every interstate infraction of the containers standardized in this bill.

Mr. DILLON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to what Dr. Fisher says on that question. I read from the hearings, page 12, in which Dr. Fisher says:

There are some features of this bill that I think the committee should consider, perhaps. In some respects it is too broad and in some too narrow. For example, the bill attempts to regulate only one form of basket, the so-called Climax basket. The penalty clause does not apply to any other basket.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It would have no effect on this legislation to strike out the word "Climax"?

Dr. FISHER. I think that word might be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other baskets of this style except those called Climax?

Dr. FISHER. I can not answer that question. So far as I know, there are not.

The CHAIRMAN. What effect would it have if it was called the Climax basket?

Dr. FISHER. I do not think that it makes any difference. I think the word "Climax" might be left out.

Mr. REAVIS. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is reading from the hearings on another bill and not on the bill under consideration.

Mr. DILLON. I have some doubt in my own mind whether the penalty is broad enough to cover anything except the Climax basket feature in accordance with the terms specified in section 3.

Mr. REAVIS. The language of section 3 is:

It shall be unlawful to manufacture for shipment or to sell for shipment any Climax baskets or other containers for small fruits, berries, or vegetables, whether filled or unfilled.

It refers to every container mentioned in the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the Revised Statutes now provide the size of a dry quart?

Mr. REAVIS. It provides for the size of the dry quart, but it is not standardized with reference to berries.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is it the same—

Mr. REAVIS. I am not sure that I am correct in that answer. I do not know whether the Revised Statutes provide for a dry quart.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think the Revised Statutes provides for the dry quart. It gives the size of the wine gallon and gives the size of the bushel, which is the Winchester bushel and contains 32 quarts. I want to know whether the size you have in this bill, the number of cubic inches here, is the same, or not, as provided for in the Winchester bushel? These things are sold by the bushel, and the gentleman would not want a quart for one kind of berry and another for potatoes.

Mr. MANN. That is what we are trying to remedy.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the basket is said to contain a quart, it ought to contain a quart.

Mr. MANN. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I wanted to know if this is the same quart.

Mr. REAVIS. It is the size given to us by the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But you do not know whether the 67.2 cubic inches of the dry quart are one thirty-second of the standard bushel?

Mr. REAVIS. I have not carried it out to see; but I do know that the dimensions of the dry quart as given in this bill are the dimensions given to us by the Bureau of Standards of the dry quart.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is satisfactory. May I ask another question? Will the Climax basket the gentleman describes, of which the outside measurement is given, hold four of those dry quarts? Does it hold four of these dry quarts or not?

Mr. REAVIS. The Bureau of Standards so states. We have taken all of the dimensions of the Climax basket and of the dry quart, and multiples and fractions thereof, from figures given us by the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Who fixed the size of the basket?

Mr. REAVIS. The Bureau of Standards.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. So as to hold those quantities?

Mr. REAVIS. So as to hold the several quantities denoted in the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is very odd that they should say a dry quart shall contain so many inches, if it is already provided by statute that that is so.

Mr. REAVIS. This bill provides for the shipment of berries, and that the standard receptacle for the shipment of berries shall be dry quart or dry measurement as distinguished from the fluid or wine measurement.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. REAVIS. There are berries on sale in the city of Washington and elsewhere represented to be pints and quarts that are one-third less than the dry measure, and yet they are represented as being quarts.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a fact that the reason you specify the size of the quart and the pint is because these smaller sizes are not made in standard Climax baskets?

Mr. REAVIS. That is correct.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And therefore you specify the exact number of cubic inches?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; that is the reason, because the Climax baskets are not the receptacles in which the smaller fruits and berries are sold.

Mr. TOWNER. In orders made is it not true that so many Climax baskets are called for?

Mr. REAVIS. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. That is, it has become a trade name; but it is not a trade-mark?

Mr. REAVIS. It is a trade name and not a trade-mark. The trade in ordering grapes makes an order for so many Climax baskets. It is just the same as ordering so many bushels of potatoes.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that contracts are made in the same way?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. And yet it is true that there is no standard that describes what a Climax basket is?

Mr. REAVIS. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. And this is for the purpose of establishing a standard, so that a contract or an order may be correctly interpreted?

Mr. REAVIS. That is entirely correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Section 4 reads:

SEC. 4. That the examination and test of Climax baskets, baskets, or other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables, for the purpose of determining whether such baskets or other containers comply with the provisions of this act, shall be made by the Department of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish and promulgate rules and regulations allowing such reasonable tolerances and variations as may be found necessary.

Does that mean that if a man in Omaha, Nebr., shall buy as he may think so many quarts of berries and find that these measures are defective, or think they were, it would require a test by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. REAVIS. The purpose of that section, as I understand it, is to put the question of tolerances and enforcement of this bill under what is known as the Bureau of Markets in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And suppose a man in Omaha has some of these baskets and thinks they are not as large as they ought to be by law, where shall he go to have the test made? This bill provides that he must go to the Department of Agriculture, and only that Department can make the test.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, this provision of the law is in compliance with the pure-food law where we have in the Department of Agriculture a bureau that is engaged in making tests all of the time, under the amendment to the pure-food law, requiring the quantity of the contents to be set forth on a large number of containers.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would the man in Omaha have to send these baskets here to the city of Washington?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the Department of Agriculture has a man in Omaha, I think. They have them in all of the large cities.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose this should happen in my own city of Racine?

Mr. MANN. He would probably have to send it, in that case, to Chicago. There is a bureau in Chicago. That is the reason it is put in here, because the Department of Agriculture has these men scattered throughout the country in constant touch with all of the makers of containers. It is for their convenience.

Mr. REAVIS. And they also have inspectors throughout the country.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should think that in the enforcement of a statute that is as important as this may prove to be, the procuring of testimony ought to be made easy as possible rather than difficult. A man might think that he is being robbed by measures that were not up to the standard, and this would require him to send them a considerable distance to have them tested, and that might be a hardship.

Mr. MANN. After all, how are you going to do? The Department of Agriculture now has men not only who make the tests in the large cities, but who are in touch with the State and local food inspectors and inspectors of weights and measures all over the country, in every State and in every city, in constant touch with them. I do not think there is any difficulty through the Department of Agriculture in reaching all of these things without trouble or expense to the individuals, either the makers of the containers or the purchasers of things where the containers are used.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that we in Nebraska are interested in this because we are producers of fruits and some department had to be empowered to administer this law, and after careful consideration upon the part of the committee of the different departments of the Government it was deemed safest and most practical to put it in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, or rather the Department of Agriculture, as the gentleman from Illinois has indicated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would this authorize the Department of Agriculture to deputize some State official to take that testimony?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Possibly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Or to make that inquiry?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Any official of the Department of Agriculture could take testimony and also investigate the matter. There are agents all over the country, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In lines 4 and 5, page 4—

And the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish and promulgate rules and regulations.

I see that is in reference to tolerances and variations. By the way, I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska what tolerance and variation are contemplated?

Mr. REAVIS. That is merely for the purpose of putting this law in harmony with the pure-food law. It is impossible to say what the tolerances are or will be. That would be for the Department of Agriculture to determine, and these baskets undoubtedly will not be precisely the same size.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If you required a man selling sugar by avoirdupois to sell so many ounces to the pound, subject to reasonable tolerance and variation to be promulgated by some official, would not the gentleman think that an extraordinary thing?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; because you are measuring by an exact standard, where no tolerance is required. Here you call for a basket containing so many cubic inches. We take it for granted that in case the basket is so nearly the standard required by this act as to show the intention on the part of the manufacturers to comply in good faith with its provisions that a tolerance to that extent would be justified.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why do not you put the tolerance in the law and not leave it to the favoritism of some executive officer? Why not say there shall not be a variation of more than so many tenths of an inch? I see here it says so many cubic inches. Why not say the toleration shall not be greater than so much, and not leave it to the discretion of some officer?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that?

Mr. REAVIS. Surely.

Mr. MANN. The pure-food law had in it a provision as to contents. That was stricken out in the House and a change was made. We worked over the question of putting in a provision with reference to the quantity of contents in a package in the committee for a good many years following the passage of the pure-food law and preceding it, and finally enacted an amendment to it providing for the naming of the quantity of contents in packages and giving the Department of Agriculture the right to make rules and regulations allowing certain tolerances. In other words, it was not possible to say in the law what the tolerance should be. Here is one kind of bottle that is made. Now, two bottles, like two men, are never identical. No two individuals in the world are identical. No two bottles are identical. But a tolerance that should be allowed in one kind of bottle would not be the tolerance which should be allowed in another kind of bottle. It depends upon how near they can make them alike. The tolerance is fixed by the department after investigation, I suppose—I think there has been no complaint about that, as far as I know—and are supposed to represent the leeway required in making the article, and they are experts at that business over there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If they are experts and know how much tolerance or allowance ought to be made in the matter of a dry half pint where the law requires that it contain 16.8 cubic inches; in other words, when the law so particularizes that it gets down to the tenths of an inch in its requirements, if these experts, to which the gentleman from Illinois refers here in Washington, know what the tolerance ought to be, why can not they tell the committee, and why can not the committee put it in the law and let there be no question about it?

Mr. MANN. Probably they could as to one kind of container, but there are many kinds of containers.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is a basket—

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there are other containers; they are not merely baskets. There are strawberry boxes of different sizes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Any ordinary wooden box is not a very complicated matter; and if these experts know what tolerance ought to be made to these people who are selling berries and can tell the committee, we can just as well put it in the law as to leave it to the discretion of some official.

Mr. MANN. I do not wonder the gentleman thinks as he does, because I thought the same way myself for many years, and reached the conclusion after a very long investigation of this subject that we had to leave it to somebody who could test and perhaps change the rules and regulations.

Mr. REAVIS. The purpose of putting this provision in this bill was to make it in harmony with previous legislation, such as the pure-food act, with the idea that the Agricultural Department was more competent to regulate the question of tolerance than the committee was.

Mr. Speaker, if there are no further interrogatories, I ask for a vote on this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. REAVIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce anything?

Mr. ADAMSON. It has not been called yet.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LIABILITY FOR BAGGAGE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a little bill that I have been requested to call up first, on the assurance that it will not take much time. It is Senate bill 3069.

The SPEAKER. What is the number on the calendar?

Mr. ADAMSON. The number on the calendar is 163, House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3069) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved March 4, 1915.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved March 4, 1915, as reads as follows, to wit:

"Provided, however, That if the goods are hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means, and the carrier is not notified as to the character of the goods, the carrier may require the shipper to specifically state in writing the value of the goods, and the carrier shall not be liable beyond the amount so specifically stated, in which case the Interstate Commerce Commission may establish and maintain rates for transportation, dependent upon the value of the property shipped as specifically stated in writing by the shipper. Such rates shall be published as are other rate schedules."

be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows, to wit:

"Provided, however, That the provisions hereof respecting liability for full actual loss, damage, or injury, notwithstanding any limitation of liability or recovery or representation or agreement or release as to value, and declaring any such limitation to be unlawful and void, shall not apply, first, to baggage carried on passenger trains or boats, or trains or boats carrying passengers; second, to property, except ordinary live stock, received for transportation concerning which the carrier shall have been or shall hereafter be expressly authorized or required by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish and maintain rates dependent upon the value declared in writing by the shipper or agreed upon in writing as the released value of the property, in which case such declaration or agreement shall have no other effect than to limit liability and recovery to an amount not exceeding the value so declared or released, and shall not be held to be a violation of section 10 of the interstate-commerce act; and any tariff schedule which may be filed with the commission pursuant to such order shall contain specific reference thereto and may establish rates varying with the value so declared or agreed upon; and the commission is hereby empowered to make such order in cases where rates dependent upon and varying with declared or agreed values would, in its opinion, be just and reasonable under the circumstances and conditions surrounding the transportation. The term 'ordinary live stock' shall include all cattle, swine, sheep, goats, horses, and mules, except such as are chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special uses."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has, I believe, an amendment which he wishes to offer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, page 3, line 4, by inserting, after the word "not," the words "so far as relates to values."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. After the word "not," in line 4, insert the words "so far as relates to values."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 4, by inserting, after the word "not," the words "so far as relates to values."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out, in line 5, page 3, the words "the interstate-commerce act," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "this act to regulate commerce, as amended."

Mr. ADAMSON. I believe that is wise. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 5, strike out the words "the interstate-commerce act" and insert the words "this act to regulate commerce, as amended."

Mr. TOWNER. Has the gentleman a copy of the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. ESCH. I have a copy.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no doubt the title is incorrectly quoted.

Mr. MANN. I have a copy of the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. TOWNER. Senate bill 3069?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Senate bill fails to describe the act correctly. There is no such thing as the "interstate-commerce act." They ought to have said, "The act to regulate commerce, as amended." We are prone to suppose that anything that comes from the Senate is dignified and sanctified, as it were.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question there?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Do I understand the gentleman's amendment is to strike out the words "interstate-commerce act"?

Mr. MANN. Yes. That is not the legal description of anything.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It says "section 10." What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MANN. My amendment is to insert the words "the act to regulate commerce, as amended." The act to regulate commerce is known by that name. That is the title of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The use of the word "this" is what puzzled me.

Mr. MANN. The reason is that this is a part of section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, and while there is nothing in the title to indicate it, this is an act to amend an act of 1915, which was to amend section 7 of the act of 1910; but section 7 of the act of 1910, of which this is all amendatory, reads, "Section 20 of the act to regulate commerce is hereby amended to read as follows," so that all this language is inserted as a part of section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, and will be printed in that shape. As the gentleman knows, we print from the document room the act to regulate commerce, and they bring it down to date from time to time, showing the amendments. It seemed a little odd to me to say "in section 20 of the act" when you refer to section 10 of the act to regulate commerce, when it is all a part of the same act as now amended. This is just a paragraph in section 20.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia permit a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman briefly state what is the exact object of this amendment? Just what is it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to answer that question.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally understood that the original Cummins amendment to the Carmack Act was intended to prevent the railroads limiting their liability by contract. There were, however, some exceptions in the amendment to the application of the prohibition. Among those exceptions was one providing that the terms of the act should not apply to goods hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means. Unfortunately, the language as used made a great deal of difficulty. The Interstate Commerce Commission desired that a change should be made for two particular reasons: First, so that the act should not apply to baggage, to which it was not intended in the original act it should apply. No one desired to include passengers' baggage in the terms of the act, and no one thought baggage was included. But it was so interpreted by the railroad companies and the Interstate Commerce Commission. By the terms of the present bill baggage is expressly excluded from the operation of the law.

It was also agreed that the terms of the act ought not to apply to those particular forms of merchandise which have been especially listed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and on which rates have been particularly made, sometimes dependent on the value of the goods. It was the express desire of the Interstate Commerce Commission that those should be taken out, and to meet these two particular conditions this amendment has been framed. I will say that it is satisfactory to the Interstate Commerce Commission; that it was unanimously reported by the committee of the Senate; that it was unanimously passed by the Senate; and that, so far as I know, there is no possible objection raised by anybody against these changes which I have explained, which are made in this amendment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. It is urged very strongly, is it not, by the traveling men throughout the entire Nation?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes, so far as it affects baggage.

Mr. COX. That is all I have reference to.

Mr. TOWNER. I will state further that it excludes goods that are carried by the express companies upon which particular rates have been made, and regarding which there are particular regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ESCH. The confusion in the act approved March 4, 1915, the commerce amendment, is due to the fact that the verbiage sought to be corrected by this bill was inserted on the floor of the Senate just before the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. It was an amendment offered by Senator REED, of Missouri, and probably without consideration of what its effect would be.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from Georgia be willing to call up H. R. 16891, the Traill County bridge bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman that there are several other bridge bills.

Mr. MANN. This is the only one I know of that is on the calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are several not on the calendar. Will we not have an opportunity to reach them by unanimous consent?

Mr. MANN. I do not believe we will have that opportunity. This will take only a moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. All right. Mr. Speaker, I call up that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 16891) granting the consent of Congress to Traill County, N. Dak., and to Polk County, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Traill County, N. Dak., and Polk County, Minn., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the village of Belmont, in the county of Traill, in the State of North Dakota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce, and I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch] if it is not all right for us to read the bill through and then dispose of the amendments afterwards?

Mr. ESCH. I have had no requests for time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have none.

Mr. MANN. This is a House Calendar bill. I do not know whether it is properly on the House Calendar or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. It imposes no charge on the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. The procedure would be to read the bill through.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. To read the bill for amendment?

Mr. MANN. No; read the bill through, and then amendments are in order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that the bill be read through, and that then we dispose of the amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That bills of lading issued by any common carrier for the transportation of goods in any Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from a place in a State to a place in a foreign country, or from a place in one State to a place in another State, or from a place in one State to a place in the same State through another State or foreign country, shall be governed by this act.

SEC. 2. That a bill in which it is stated that the goods are consigned or destined to a specified person is a straight bill.

SEC. 3. That a bill in which it is stated that the goods are consigned or destined to the order of any person named in such bill is an order bill. Any provision in such a bill or in any notice, contract, rule, regulation, or tariff that it is nonnegotiable shall be null and void and shall not affect its negotiability within the meaning of this act.

SEC. 4. That order bills issued in a State for the transportation of goods to any place in the United States on the Continent of North America, except Alaska and Panama, shall not be issued in parts or sets. If so issued, the carrier issuing them shall be liable for failure to deliver the goods described therein to anyone who purchases a part for value in good faith, even though the purchase be after the delivery of the goods by the carrier to a holder of one of the other parts: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall be interpreted or construed to forbid the issuing of order bills in parts or sets for such transportation of goods to Alaska, Panama, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, or foreign countries, or to impose the liabilities set forth in this section for so doing.

SEC. 5. That when more than one order bill is issued in a State for the same goods to be transported to any place in the United States on the Continent of North America, except Alaska and Panama, the word "duplicate," or some other word or words indicating that the document is not an original bill, shall be placed plainly upon the face of every such bill except the one first issued. A carrier shall be liable for the damage caused by his failure so to do to anyone who has purchased the bill for value in good faith as an original, even though the purchase be after the delivery of the goods by the carrier to the holder of the original bill: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall in such case for such transportation of goods to Alaska, Panama, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, or foreign countries be interpreted or construed so as to require the placing of the word "duplicate" thereon, or to impose the liabilities set forth in this section for failure so to do.

SEC. 6. That a straight bill shall have placed plainly upon its face by the carrier issuing it "nonnegotiable" or "not negotiable."

This section shall not apply, however, to memoranda or acknowledgments of an informal character.

SEC. 7. That the insertion in an order bill of the name of a person to be notified of the arrival of the goods shall not limit the negotiability of the bill or constitute notice to a purchaser thereof of any rights or equities of such person in the goods.

SEC. 8. That a carrier, in the absence of some lawful excuse, is bound to deliver goods upon a demand made either by the consignee named in the bill for the goods or, if the bill is an order bill, by the holder thereof, if such a demand is accompanied by—

(a) An offer in good faith to satisfy the carrier's lawful lien upon the goods;

(b) An offer in good faith to surrender, properly indorsed, the bill which was issued for the goods, if the bill is an order bill; and

(c) A readiness and willingness to sign, when the goods are delivered, an acknowledgment that they have been delivered, if such signature is requested by the carrier.

In case the carrier refuses or fails to deliver the goods in compliance with a demand by the consignee or holder so accompanied, the burden shall be upon the carrier to establish the existence of a lawful excuse for such refusal or failure.

Sec. 9. That a carrier is justified, subject to the provisions of the three following sections, in delivering goods to one who is—

- (a) A person lawfully entitled to the possession of the goods, or
- (b) The consignee named in a straight bill for the goods, or
- (c) A person in possession of an order bill for the goods, by the terms of which the goods are deliverable to his order, or which has been indorsed to him, or in blank by the consignee, or by the mediate or immediate indorsee of the consignee.

Sec. 10. That where a carrier delivers goods to one who is not lawfully entitled to the possession of them, the carrier shall be liable to anyone having a right of property or possession in the goods if he delivered the goods otherwise than as authorized by subdivisions (b) and (c) of the preceding section; and, though he delivered the goods as authorized by either of said subdivisions, he shall be so liable if prior to such delivery he—

- (a) Had been requested, by or on behalf of a person having a right of property or possession in the goods, not to make such delivery, or
- (b) Had information at the time of the delivery that it was to a person not lawfully entitled to the possession of the goods.

Such request or information, to be effective within the meaning of this section, must be given to an officer or agent of the carrier, the actual or apparent scope of whose duties includes action upon such a request or information, and must be given in time to enable the officer or agent to whom it is given, acting with reasonable diligence, to stop delivery of the goods.

Sec. 11. That except as provided in section 26, and except when compelled by legal process, if a carrier delivers goods for which an order bill had been issued, the negotiation of which would transfer the right to the possession of the goods, and fails to take up and cancel the bill, such carrier shall be liable for failure to deliver the goods to anyone who for value and in good faith purchases such bill, whether such purchaser acquired title to the bill before or after the delivery of the goods by the carrier and notwithstanding delivery was made to the person entitled thereto.

Sec. 12. That except as provided in section 26, and except when compelled by legal process, if a carrier delivers part of the goods for which an order bill had been issued and fails either—

- (a) To take up and cancel the bill, or
- (b) To place plainly upon it a statement that a portion of the goods has been delivered with a description which may be in general terms either of the goods or packages that have been so delivered or of the goods or packages which still remain in the carrier's possession; he shall be liable for failure to deliver all the goods specified in the bill to anyone who for value and in good faith purchases it, whether such purchaser acquired title to it before or after the delivery of any portion of the goods by the carrier, and notwithstanding such delivery was made to the person entitled thereto.

Sec. 13. That any alteration, addition, or erasure in a bill after its issue without authority from the carrier issuing the same, either in writing or noted on the bill, shall be void, whatever be the nature and purpose of the change, and the bill shall be enforceable according to its original tenor.

Sec. 14. That where an order bill has been lost, stolen, or destroyed a court of competent jurisdiction may order the delivery of the goods upon satisfactory proof of such loss or destruction, and upon the giving of a bond, with sufficient surety, to be approved by the court, to protect the carrier or any person injured by such delivery from any liability or loss incurred by reason of the original bill remaining outstanding, the court may also, in its discretion, order the payment of the carrier's reasonable costs and counsel fees.

The delivery of the goods under an order of the court, as provided in this section, shall not relieve the carrier from liability to a person to whom the order bill has been or shall be negotiated for value without notice of the proceedings or of the delivery of the goods.

Sec. 15. That a bill upon the face of which the word "duplicate" or some other word or words indicating that the document is not an original bill is placed plainly shall impose upon the carrier issuing the same the liability of one who represents and warrants that such bill is an accurate copy of an original bill properly issued, but no other liability.

Sec. 16. That no title to goods or right to their possession asserted by a carrier for his own benefit shall excuse him from liability for refusing to deliver the goods according to the terms of a bill issued for them, unless such title or right is derived directly or indirectly from a transfer made by the consignor or consignee after the shipment, or from the carrier's lien.

Sec. 17. That if more than one person claim the title or possession of goods, the carrier may require all known claimants to interplead, either as a defense to an action brought against him for nondelivery of the goods or as an original suit, whichever is appropriate.

Sec. 18. That if some one other than the consignee or the person in possession of the bill has a claim to the title or possession of the goods, and the carrier has information of such claim, the carrier shall be excused from liability for refusing to deliver the goods, either to the consignee or person in possession of the bill or to the adverse claimant, until the carrier has had a reasonable time to ascertain the validity of the adverse claim or to bring legal proceedings to compel all claimants to interplead.

Sec. 19. That except as provided in the two preceding sections and in section 9, no right or title of a third person, unless enforced by legal process, shall be a defense to an action brought by the consignee of a straight bill or by the holder of an order bill against the carrier for failure to deliver the goods on demand.

Sec. 20. That when goods are loaded by a carrier such carrier shall count the packages of goods, if package freight, and ascertain the kind and quantity, if bulk freight, and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading or in any notice, receipt, contract, rule, regulation, or tariff, "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like import, indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

Sec. 21. That when goods are loaded by a shipper, at a place where the carrier maintains an agency, such carrier shall, on written request of such shipper, and when given a reasonable opportunity by the shipper so to do, count the packages of goods, if package freight, and ascertain the kind and quantity of bulk freight, within a reasonable time after such written request, and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading, or in any notice, receipt, contract, rule, regulation, or tariff, "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like purport indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

Sec. 22. That if a bill of lading has been issued by a carrier or on his behalf by an agent or employee the scope of whose actual or apparent authority includes the issuing of bills of lading the carrier shall be liable to (a) the consignee named in a straight bill or (b) the holder of an order bill, who has given value in good faith, relying upon the description therein of the goods, for damages caused by the nonreceipt by the carrier of all or part of the goods or their failure to correspond with the description thereof in the bill at the time of its issue.

Sec. 23. That if goods are delivered to a carrier by the owner or by a person whose act in conveying the title to them to a purchaser for value in good faith would bind the owner, and an order bill is issued for them, they can not thereafter, while in the possession of the carrier, be attached by garnishment or otherwise or be levied upon under an execution unless the bill be first surrendered to the carrier or its negotiation enjoined. The carrier shall in no such case be compelled to deliver the actual possession of the goods until the bill is surrendered to him or impounded by the court.

Sec. 24. That a creditor whose debtor is the owner of an order bill shall be entitled to such aid from courts of appropriate jurisdiction by injunction and otherwise in attaching such bill or in satisfying the claim by means thereof as is allowed at law or in equity in regard to property which can not readily be attached or levied upon by ordinary legal process.

Sec. 25. That if an order bill is issued the carrier shall have no lien on the goods therein mentioned except for charges on those goods for freight, storage, demurrage and terminal charges, and expenses necessary for the preservation of the goods or incident to their transportation subsequent to the date of the bill, unless the bill expressly enumerates other charges for which a lien is claimed. In such case there shall also be a lien for the charges enumerated so far as they are allowed by law and the contract between the consignor and the carrier.

Sec. 26. That after goods have been lawfully sold to satisfy a carrier's lien, or because they have not been claimed, or because they are perishable or hazardous, the carrier shall not thereafter be liable for failure to deliver the goods themselves to the consignee or owner of the goods, or to a holder of the bill given for the goods when they were shipped, even if such bill be an order bill.

Sec. 27. That an order bill may be negotiated by delivery where, by the terms of the bill, the carrier undertakes to deliver the goods to the order of a specified person, and such person or a subsequent indorsee of the bill has indorsed it in blank.

Sec. 28. That an order bill may be negotiated by the indorsement of the person to whose order the goods are deliverable by the tenor of the bill. Such indorsement may be in blank or to a specified person. If indorsed to a specified person, it may be negotiated again by the indorsement of such person in blank or to another specified person. Subsequent negotiation may be made in like manner.

Sec. 29. That a bill may be transferred by the holder by delivery, accompanied with an agreement, express or implied, to transfer the title to the bill or to the goods represented thereby. A straight bill can not be negotiated, and the indorsement of such a bill gives the transferee no additional right.

Sec. 30. That an order bill may be negotiated by any person in possession of the same, however such possession may have been acquired, if by the terms of the bill the carrier undertakes to deliver the goods to the order of such person, or if at the time of negotiation the bill is in such form that it may be negotiated by delivery.

Sec. 31. That a person to whom an order bill has been duly negotiated acquires thereby—

- (a) Such title to the goods as the person negotiating the bill to him had or had ability to convey to a purchaser in good faith for value, and also such title to the goods as the consignee and consignor had or had power to convey to a purchaser in good faith for value; and
- (b) The direct obligation of the carrier to hold possession of the goods for him according to the terms of the bill as fully as if the carrier had contracted directly with him.

Sec. 32. That a person to whom a bill has been transferred, but not negotiated, acquires thereby as against the transferor the title to the goods, subject to the terms of any agreement with the transferor. If the bill is a straight bill such person also acquires the right to notify the carrier of the transfer to him of such bill and thereby to become the direct obligee of whatever obligations the carrier owed to the transferor of the bill immediately before the notification.

Prior to the notification of the carrier by the transferor or transferee of a straight bill the title of the transferee to the goods and the right to acquire the obligation of the carrier may be defeated by garnishment or by attachment or execution upon the goods by a creditor of the transferor, or by a notification to the carrier by the transferor or a subsequent purchaser from the transferor of a subsequent sale of the goods by the transferor.

A carrier has not received notification within the meaning of this section unless an officer or agent of the carrier, the actual or apparent scope of whose duties includes action upon such a notification, has been notified; and no notification shall be effective until the officer or agent to whom it is given has had time, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, to communicate with the agent or agents having actual possession or control of the goods.

Sec. 33. That where an order bill is transferred for value by delivery, and the indorsement of the transferor is essential for negotiation, the transferee acquires a right against the transferor to compel him to indorse the bill, unless a contrary intention appears. The negotiation shall take effect as of the time when the indorsement is actually made. This obligation may be specifically enforced.

Sec. 34. That a person who negotiates or transfers for value a bill by indorsement or delivery, unless a contrary intention appears, warrants—

- (a) That the bill is genuine;
- (b) That he has a legal right to transfer it;
- (c) That he has knowledge of no fact which would impair the validity or worth of the bill;
- (d) That he has a right to transfer the title to the goods, and that the goods are merchantable or fit for a particular purpose whenever such warranties would have been implied if the contract of the parties had been to transfer without a bill the goods represented thereby.

Sec. 35. That the indorsement of a bill shall not make the indorser liable for any failure on the part of the carrier or previous indorsers of the bill to fulfill their respective obligations.

Sec. 36. That a mortgagee or pledgee or other holder of a bill for security who in good faith demands or receives payment of the debt for which such bill is security, whether from a party to a draft drawn for such debt or from any other person, shall not be deemed by so doing to represent or warrant the genuineness of such bill or the quantity or quality of the goods therein described.

Sec. 37. That the validity of the negotiation of a bill is not impaired by the fact that such negotiation was a breach of duty on the part of the person making the negotiation, or by the fact that the owner of the bill was deprived of the possession of the same by fraud, accident, mistake, duress, loss, theft, or conversion, if the person to whom the bill was negotiated, or a person to whom the bill was subsequently negotiated, gave value therefor in good faith, without notice of the breach of duty, or fraud, accident, mistake, duress, loss, theft, or conversion.

Sec. 38. That where a person, having sold, mortgaged, or pledged goods which are in a carrier's possession and for which an order bill has been issued, or having sold, mortgaged, or pledged the order bill representing such goods, continues in possession of the order bill, the subsequent negotiation thereof by that person under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof to any person receiving the same in good faith, for value and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the first purchaser of the goods or bill had expressly authorized the subsequent negotiation.

Sec. 39. That where an order bill has been issued for goods no seller's lien or right of stoppage in transitu shall defeat the rights of any purchaser for value in good faith to whom such bill has been negotiated, whether such negotiation be prior or subsequent to the notification to the carrier who issued such bill of the seller's claim to a lien or right of stoppage in transitu. Nor shall the carrier be obliged to deliver or justified in delivering the goods to an unpaid seller unless such bill is first surrendered for cancellation.

Sec. 40. That, except as provided in section 39, nothing in this act shall limit the rights and remedies of a mortgagee or lien holder whose mortgage or lien on goods would be valid, apart from this act, as against one who for value and in good faith purchased from the owner, immediately prior to the time of their delivery to the carrier, the goods which are subject to the mortgage or lien and obtained possession of them.

Sec. 41. That any person who, knowingly or with intent to defraud, falsely makes, alters, forges, counterfeits, prints, or photographs any bill of lading, or with like intent utters or publishes as true and genuine any such falsely altered, forged, counterfeited, falsely printed, or photographed bill of lading, knowing it to be falsely altered, forged, counterfeited, falsely printed or photographed, or aids in making, altering, forging, counterfeiting, printing or photographing, or uttering or publishing the same, or issues or aids in issuing or procuring the issue of, or negotiates or transfers for value a bill which contains a false statement as to the receipt of the goods, or as to any other matter, or who, with intent to defraud, violates, or fails to comply with, or aids in any violation of, or failure to comply with any provision of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished for each offense by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both.

Sec. 42. That in any case not provided for in this act the rules of law and equity, including the law merchant, shall govern.

Sec. 43. First. That in this act, unless the context of subject matter otherwise requires—

"Action" includes counterclaim, set-off, and suit in equity.

"Bill" means bill of lading governed by this act.

"Consignee" means the person named in the bill as the person to whom delivery of the goods is to be made.

"Consignor" means the person named in the bill as the person from whom the goods have been received for shipment.

"Goods" means merchandise or chattels in course of transportation or which have been or are about to be transported.

"Holder" of a bill means a person who has both actual possession of such bill and a right of property therein.

"Order" means an order by indorsement on the bill.

"Owner" does not include mortgagee or pledgee.

"Person" includes a corporation or partnership or two or more persons having a joint or common interest.

"To purchase" includes to take as mortgagee and to take as pledgee.

"Purchaser" includes mortgagee and pledgee.

"State" includes any Territory, District, insular possession, or isthmian possession.

Second. A thing is done "in good faith" within the meaning of this act when it is in fact done honestly, whether it be done negligently or not.

Sec. 44. That the provisions of this act do not apply to bills made and delivered prior to the taking effect thereof.

Sec. 45. That the provisions and each part thereof and the sections and each part thereof of this act are independent and severable, and the declaring of any provision or part thereof, or provisions or part thereof, or section or part thereof, or sections or part thereof, unconstitutional shall not impair or render unconstitutional any other provision or part thereof or section or part thereof.

Sec. 46. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January next after its passage.

The SPEAKER. There are some committee amendments to this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the committee amendments are reported I wish to say that this morning the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] made a request to take up a resolution making appropriations for the relief of flood sufferers in some of the States, and I objected temporarily. I shall not object now to the consideration of the bill, and if it is to be considered, I think it would be wise to consider it at once, in the hope that after it is passed, and while some gentleman is addressing the House this afternoon, there may be time to get the enrolled bill here, so that it may be signed by the Speaker to-day, and not have to go over until Friday. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will be willing to let the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] make his request.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he would not be willing, unless the consideration of some amendments is desired separately, to let the amendments to this bill-of-lading bill be read and adopted in gross before I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There are some amendments to be offered to some of the committee amendments, and therefore I could not consent to adopting them in gross.

Mr. MANN. It would not be practicable to do that and have the enrolled bill back here to be signed by the Speaker to-night. If the joint resolution is to come up at all, it comes up because it is an emergency matter, where time is of the very essence of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I realize very keenly the necessity for passing that resolution to relieve the flood sufferers, because a great many of them are in my State, and I know their condition. I presume if I ask that this bill be temporarily laid aside, it will be the unfinished business whenever I can get it up.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia does not need to make any request at all. All he needs to do is to wink his other eye at the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and the gentleman from Alabama will make his request.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Alabama is standing here beside me, and he has seen me wink both eyes several times.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the gentleman from Alabama gets his bill through, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] to continue the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. We will have something else then, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to him with the greatest pleasure.

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to call up and put on its passage Senate joint resolution 160, appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration S. J. Res. 160, which has already been read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to express my grateful appreciation to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], because this is a matter of the utmost importance.

The SPEAKER. The question is—

Mr. CANNON. It is up for consideration, I take it.

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is up for consideration, if anybody wants to debate it.

Mr. MANN. There are several gentlemen who want to be heard on it, and I want to hear them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. Has consent been given for its consideration?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How are we considering this now?

The SPEAKER. Considering it in the House.

Mr. MANN. Has the request been made to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. It is a Union Calendar bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to consider this joint resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I did not object to the consideration of this bill. I was down in North Carolina last week, and I found that there has been great destruction of property in that State by floods and much loss of life. I believe the citizens of that State are contributing for the relief of those who have suffered. I do not know whether there has been any effort by the citizens for relief in Alabama in the way of subscriptions or not.

Mr. OLIVER. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that there has been.

Mr. BURNETT. And the governor has issued a proclamation asking for contributions from the people.

Mr. CANNON. That is right, but when this appropriation is made—and I am not opposing it—the subscriptions for relief will cease. I think that would be so if it was in Illinois or anywhere else.

The gentleman said that the Legislature of Alabama could not be called together without notice. That is unfortunate. With these rivers where the floods are liable to come at any time, it seems to me that sound legislation should make provision for the townships or the municipalities or the county authorities or the State authorities to pledge their credit, if necessary, in such cases for relief.

When you go down to Texas—and I believe Texas is not mentioned in these flood States—I am told that the constitution of the State of Texas prohibits the State giving relief in cases of this kind. And yet when thousands of lives—stated to be 10,000—were lost in the Galveston flood some years ago, from all over the United States and to some extent from all over the world, people from the standpoint of sympathy and humanity poured in their donations for relief of those who suffered to a much greater quantity than the State of Texas would probably have done if it had been clothed with power to relieve the situation.

Then again, when the Johnstown flood came I believe as many as a thousand lives were lost, with great destruction of property; there was universal contribution, so great that I am reliably informed that the money to relieve the distress there, which came from voluntary contributions all over the country, has not yet all been expended.

The habit grows from perhaps all the States, instead of taking care of their people in disaster of unloading upon Uncle Sam's Treasury the expense of relief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I believe this habit grows most rapidly in the Southern States whenever there is trouble. For example, take the canker trouble in the citrus orchards. At this session we appropriated $300,000 by a deficiency bill to fight the disease in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, and Florida, and my recollection is the States did not contribute.

I do not object to this appropriation. It is pretty hard for a man to object if there is real suffering, but the more we respond from Washington from the Federal Treasury the more applications we will have.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that he depicted the distress and destruction in Alabama, and the same conditions prevail in my State, and that is the reason why I introduced a resolution for the relief of flood sufferers in South Carolina. There is distress and destitution because of the floods and storms, which they have not had for 50 years.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to add but little to what has been said. I understand the views of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and appreciate his graciousness in not making objection to the consideration of the resolution, notwithstanding those views. These applications to aid those in distress from time to time have not all come from the South. I remember when a few years ago we were called upon, and I believe every Member of the South responded to the call of people in Ohio when a large territory was submerged and there was a loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property.

We did not wait to inquire whether that was north of the Mason and Dixon line.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It was not north of the Mason and Dixon line. It was a part of the line, and it also included the Mississippi.

Mr. BURNETT. I thank the gentleman for that correction as to the geographical location of the submerged territory.

Mr. CANNON. And if the gentleman will allow me further, I am not defending it at all. In fact I stated that.

Mr. BURNETT. I believe my good friend voted with us for it.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect whether I did or not.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not remember either, but the idea of State rights referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] does not deter us from the South whenever there is a cry of distress from coming to the aid of those in distress.

We showed that in the case of Salem, Mass., when the fire fiend swept that town. We showed it when San Francisco was destroyed, and I believe that in spite of any views that we have on the doctrine of State rights you will always find my colleagues from the South joining with their brethren from the North whenever there is a Macedonian cry to come over and help those in distress.

I desire again to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and also to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who so magnanimously gave a part of his time in order that we might consider this important measure. I ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has referred to the Ohio River floods and the Salem, Mass., fire. I believe we made an appropriation for Salem, Mass., no portion of which was ever expended, as I recall, or, if so, a very little of it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I think $40,000 was expended. I think that was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MANN. A very small part of it was expended. We did not appropriate anything at the time of the Ohio River flood for the purpose of purchasing seeds or for the purpose of putting somebody to work, though we had nothing for them to do. I think that in these cases where there has been great national disaster the Congress has frequently responded by providing temporarily for food, and sometimes for clothing, providing shelter, blankets with which to keep people warm, or something of that kind, and even that has led us into it almost as a habit. I have not raised any objection at this time to the consideration of this resolution, although it introduces a new and novel departure from the practice heretofore. It provides that the Government shall purchase and give away seeds. I do not know but that is as well justified as the congressional seed distribution, which I have never tried to justify. It provides for the employment of people, regardless of whether we have anything for them to do. I understand what the reason for that is. Gentlemen will say that we may just as well have people work if we are going to give them money as to give them the money without the work, and, in fact, it may be cheaper to give to those only who are willing to work than to advertise to everyone that you will give them food and clothing for nothing.

I realize this, Mr. Speaker. This is a very great country. It has a large population, it extends over a large area of territory. It has great wealth, and it can afford to do the things that do not lead into great extravagance. When some disaster overcomes a small portion of the people or a large portion of the people, which is too great for them to meet out of their own holdings at the time, it may be entirely proper that the rest of us throughout the country shall contribute, and that is what we are proposing to do now. The city from which I come suffered as great a disaster as any place in the world ever did. I do not recall that Congress ever made any appropriation either for shelter or food or clothing, though I do recall that the heart of the country everywhere, East and West, South and North, at that time brought all kinds of necessary contributions into Chicago, and undoubtedly saved the lives of many and aided in the comfort of many. I think perhaps that which we may ourselves voluntarily do, may sometimes be done by the Government in behalf of all. As I recall, I personally voted for an appropriation for the benefit of some of the people in Italy who were overcome by earthquakes. I voted the other day to ask the President to beg money for the Armenians and for someone else the next day. While I have been willing to do these things for some of the people in foreign lands, I much prefer myself to help some of our own people at home who are suffering very great disaster rather than to take special pride in voting money to help somebody in other lands where we are not bound to take care of them. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want for a moment to explain the conditions in my section of the State of North Carolina which impel me urgently to support this resolution and to ask every Member here to support it. Of the 13 counties comprising my district 5 have been seriously stricken by the recent floods. In one county—that of Transylvania, according to a statement submitted to me which is semi-official, being by members of the board of county commissioners and by the mayor of the town which is the county seat—90 per cent of the crops of the entire county are destroyed, and 90 per cent of the land on which these crops grew is also destroyed, being covered by rocks and debris, rendering it unfertile and uncultivable for the future. Not only that, but every public road is ruined. Every county and State bridge is gone. The same conditions obtain in the county of McDowell, where it is said on authority which I thoroughly accredit, 90 per cent of the crops are ruined and 75 per cent of the cultivatable land is ruined. At the same time in the same place all of the bridges and roads are practically ruined. Only yesterday I read in a letter received from a citizen of that county that a man had been four days in getting less than 16 miles to the county seat. Every bridge of every sort, even footbridges, had been carried away, and he of necessity was practically compelled to go to the source of the streams in order to cross them to get to the county seat.

Many people, hundreds of families, have been rendered homeless. Many small workshops and factories have been ruined and crops are destroyed. It is too late in the season for them to replant, and hundreds—and I would not be exaggerating to say thousands—of families are in real need. I do not mean by this, Mr. Speaker, that they are in immediate danger of starvation—that is not my meaning—but they are rendered homeless, their lands are destroyed, and whatever productive interests they have are gone, and there is nothing else in sight. I have filed with the War Department, where an investigation is being made, a great sheaf of telegrams, letters, and statements setting forth the devastated condition, and I should like to be permitted to put them in the Record as a verification of what I am saying.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to incorporate in his remarks certain telegrams and letters with respect to this situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITT. Without attempting to go into further details, Mr. Speaker, I trust that this relief will be granted. It is not a question of whether it is North or South, but it is a question of immediate and urgent relief. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, The pending resolution should receive, and I trust will receive, the cheerful support of every member of this body. It provides Federal assistance to that section of our country which recently has suffered such terrible loss by the most disastrous flood that has ever visited that section since it has been settled or has had a history.

Immediately upon seeing in the papers the first account of this great disaster, I at once left Washington and set out for my home in western North Carolina, which is in the section so completely devastated. I traveled about 100 miles over the worst stricken part of the country, most of the way on horseback, but part of the way on foot, the roads being so completely destroyed or so badly damaged as to make it impossible to pursue the ordinary routes of travel, and I feel that I know the real situation.

The greatest damage, so far as my personal observations extended, was along a portion of New River west of the Blue Ridge and along the Yadkin and Catawba Rivers and their tributaries south of the Blue Ridge, though I have no doubt that other sections of western North Carolina suffered just as severely. Appalling as was the description given in the papers, I was in no manner prepared for the sights of destruction that were presented to my vision. Many, many hundreds of homes entirely swept away; crops totally destroyed for miles and miles, and the land in many places rendered practically valueless for years to come; people without food and without shelter and no roads by which even the actual necessities of life could be transported to them. The fact is that no language that I can possibly command will in any manner describe or even make a shadow of the real conditions that exist.

If it were only a question of the loss of property our proud and formerly independent people, I am sure, would not appeal to the National Government for aid, nor would they expect nor accept it from any source; but when the loss is so complete and so widespread as to produce great suffering which it is impossible for the local communities to relieve, I feel that the strong arm of our National Government should stretch forth the hand of relief and not turn so many suffering people away empty. A noble Christian spirit has moved the people of our State to respond cheerfully to the many distressing calls for help, but not enough can nor will be raised in that way, considerable as the amount is, to meet the exigencies of the situation. The small amount asked for in this resolution will not and is not intended to release those who have not suffered, or, having suffered, are still able to help, but is only intended to augment what they are giving and will continue to give, and also to show those people who are in great distress and destitution that our Federal Government is willing to extend its helping hand to them. It is for a once proud and self-reliant people, now rendered by no fault of their own, so far as the human mind can see or understand, helpless, homeless, and dependent, that I plead and urgently request your generous consideration and action.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that unanimous consent be given to all gentlemen who desire to extend their remarks on this subject for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] desires to submit some remarks, and I do not wish to lose or waive any rights under the call, but I am perfectly willing to yield to the gentleman to make those remarks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for the time that was allotted him this afternoon, and that the order allotting time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] to address the House this afternoon may be transferred to Friday afternoon, following the orders already entered.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is understood this is without prejudice to the rights of our committee under the call.

Mr. MANN. This is a request for unanimous consent; of course that does not affect it.

The SPEAKER. The next time Wednesday comes around and the House is in session the gentleman from Georgia has the right of way.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. And to proceed where he left off.

The SPEAKER. Yes; to begin where he left off. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the leave to address the House granted to Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. SLOAN, of Nebraska, for to-day be transferred to next Friday under the same conditions.

Mr. MANN. And that the gentleman from Missouri have leave now to address the House.

The SPEAKER. And that the gentleman from Missouri proceed now. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article in to-day's Baltimore Sun on the questions propounded to Mr. Hughes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an editorial in the Baltimore Sun. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think I will not object, although I know I ought to do so. The gentleman from Indiana very seldom makes a request of any kind that is not founded on something, and I am not going to object to his request, but it is perfectly patent we are not going to conduct a political campaign wholly through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or at public expense. And as long as our Democratic friends are insisting, as they are doing over in the Senate, that they shall limit the amount of money which may be raised for campaign purposes, but want it all done from their side at public expense, and in addition have their public officers all engaged in the campaign at public expense, a wholly unfair proposition, if it keeps up I shall object to all these requests. I do not object to this one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for an hour.

OUR VANISHING MEAT SUPPLY.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, if there is any one industry in our country which vitally affects the life, prosperity, and happiness of every citizen in it, it is the production and marketing of meat animals. We are confronted to-day with a vanishing meat supply and the rapid increase of meat-consuming population. It seems but a few years ago when America thought that she could feed the world, and yet in the last five years we have actually reached a point of importing a part of our meat supply. Clearly, there is something wrong, and the great live-stock industry, which ought to be one of the pillars of our national prosperity, is being threatened with extinction.

The farmer and stock raiser has been hard hit in the last few years, and the wage earner and consumer has been still harder hit. The consumer has seen the prices of beef and meat products soar skyward, and he imagines that the farmer and the stock raiser must be getting very profitable prices for the live animals. As a matter of fact, however, the prices paid to the farmers and to the cattle raisers has not been sufficient in view of the increased cost of production to encourage men to go into business, and has even driven many of them out. The production of meat animals in this country has been decreasing, which would not be the case if the business were even fairly profitable to the cattle raiser. The census figures tell the whole story.

In 1900 we had 50,000,000 head of cattle in this country, exclusive of dairy stock. In 1910 we had only 41,000,000 head, and in 1915 the number had decreased to 37,000,000. During this time our population of meat eaters was increasing. In 1900 the population of the United States was 75,000,000 people; in 1910 it was 91,000,000; and in 1915 it had passed the hundred million mark. Thus, while the number of meat consumers had increased 25,000,000, or 33½ per cent, in 15 years, the number of beef cattle had decreased 13,000,000, or 25 per cent, in the same length of time.

Most Americans imagine the West is covered with countless herds of cattle which are fed on the public domain and raised practically without cost, except the care of herding. When I was a boy this was almost literally true. All of Oklahoma, two-thirds of Kansas, Nebraska, and Texas, and all of the States west of them, were open ranges, and cattle could be driven from the Rio Grande to the British line and back again, feeding on free range all the way. A great change has come over the cattle business in the last two decades. Most of the range country has been fenced up by the advancing army of homesteaders. A large number of cattle which now find their way to the market are of the class known as "native steers" which are fed by farmers in small bunches in the great corn belt and blue-grass belt in the Mississippi Valley. These cattle produce the best beef in the world. Unfortunately, the farmers are rarely able to raise the young stock to the age at which it pays to fatten them for the market.

If a farmer has good pasture with running water and has a supply of corn on his own place, or which he can conveniently procure from his neighbors, he will invest in a small bunch of feeders to be fattened for the market. If he can not find these feeders in his own neighborhood, he goes to the nearest great market—like Kansas City, St. Joseph, Omaha, Sioux City—and buys them there. Sometimes these feeders come from the ranges farther west; sometimes they come from adjoining parts of the country, where feed is short and where drought is threatened.

The farmer figures to feed the cattle a certain amount within a certain limited time, and bring them back to market increased in weight. Usually he must borrow the money to finance this operation from some of the banks or numerous cattle-loan companies, giving a chattel mortgage on the cattle. This virtually compels him to sell the cattle in time to pay the chattel mortgage, no matter how disastrous the market may happen to be. It will be seen that the farmer or stock feeder must figure as closely on every detail of the operation as any mercantile business in order to come out with a profit or save himself from loss. Unfortunately, the profits of cattle feeders in the last few years has not been such as to encourage the most careful of experienced men in business to extend their operation. Yet, the raising of cattle and the fattening of them for the market is a vital factor in our national prosperity.

With all our talk of preparedness, conservation, and efficiency, it would be a crying shame if the United States would be brought to the point of importing its meat supply. The blue-grass belt of the Middle West is the best region in the known world for the raising of cattle. Much of the intermountain territory is principally available for that purpose, and farm animals are necessary even on the farms of the East. Farm animals fill a great place in rural economy. They consume much of the feed on the farm which is not available for shipment; they preserve the fertility of the soil, and occupy the woodlands and rough pasture land which can not be tilled. Congress has recently passed some legislation which will make still more important the fattening of meat animals on the farm, the grain-grading bill providing a standard of grain for shipment in interstate commerce. Its operation is a very useful one in many respects, but what is to be done with the grain that does not come up to the interstate standard?

It is manifest that the only profitable way to get rid of it is to feed it on the farm. While, therefore, the farmer and stock raiser has been facing an increased cost of production without a corresponding increase in the value of his live animals on the market, what has been the result to the consumer? The consumer has been paying increasingly high prices. Much of this high price is due at the present time to the enormous demand abroad and the shortage in this country. Some part of the shortage in this country is due to the changing conditions in the live-stock industry from the ranging of cattle in large numbers to the fattening of native steers in small bunches. That change in business has necessarily decreased to some extent the supply of cattle. But the condition will become worse, both for the producer and for the consumer, unless some reasonable attempt is made to solve the new problems. We must begin to treat our meat supply as a national asset.

If we were to attempt to classify the people interested in the live-stock industry, we might say that they were divided into:

First. The ranchman, who raised the cattle on the western plains from the calf to the matured steer.

Second. The cattle feeder in the corn belt, who buys the thin cattle and fattens them for the market by using the corn and grass upon his own farm.

Third. The commission merchants in the live-stock centers, who act as selling agents for the ranchmen and for the cattle feeders.

Fourth. The packers who control the slaughtering of the animals and practically every avenue for the sale and distribution of the products.

Fifth. The consuming public, who are entirely out of touch with the cattle raisers and who must deal with the packer.

It will be seen that the packer stands squarely between the production of cattle on the one side and the consumption of meat products on the other. While the price of meat has been going up and while the production of cattle has been depressed, what has been the effect upon the packers?

The five great packers—Swift, Armour, Morris, Sulzberger & Sons, and Cudahy—have much the most phenomenal growth in capital, surplus, and resources in the history of any business in the world. Swift & Co. is the largest of the packers. Eighteen years ago the working capital of Swift & Co. was $17,000,000 and their earnings and profit $2,000,000 a year. The volume of their business was about $100,000,000 a year. In 1915 the working capital was approximately $121,000,000; earnings, over $14,000,000; and the volume of business over $500,000,000. The working capital of Swift alone in 1915 was almost as much as the combined capital of the packers 18 years ago. Swift's capital has increased nearly 800 per cent in 17 years, and these are the same 17 years in which the cattle-raising industry has fallen off 25 per cent.

The other packers have fared almost as well. The dominance of these five packers in the market has shown up the fact that 70 per cent of all the cattle slaughtered for interstate shipment under Government inspection was slaughtered by these five concerns. Of course there are still a number of independent slaughterhouses in the country, but, necessarily, their trade is local and their influence upon the market almost negligible.

Yet it is a remarkable thing that in the cities where those independent concerns are located the big packers are not seeking the fresh-beef trade. The big packers say that they have facilities for doing business cheaply on a large scale, and facilities for getting rid of the offal and by-products, which ought to be of great benefit to the consumer and cheapen the price of meat to the public, but when they get into Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and Des Moines they find that they can not compete with the relatively small local concerns. They keep out of the fresh-beef trade in those markets where there are still independent concerns.

There used to be a demand for cattle for export, and export buyers competed with the packing-house buyers in all of the great live-stock centers. A few years ago, however, the demand for cattle for export practically ceased because of the competition of cheaper cattle from Argentina and Australia, and thus the packers in this country were relieved from the active competition of foreign buyers. Since then it has been contended by the cattlemen that the packers no longer competed for live animals, but virtually manipulated the market, fixed the price, and divided up the cattle among themselves upon some proportionate basis. In order to forestall the effects of foreign competition, the packers have gone into Australia, Uruguay, and Argentina and established packing plants in those countries, so that they are able to control the export trade.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How long have the American packers had a branch in Argentina and other South American countries?

Mr. BORLAND. My data are about five years. Of course, they have been increasing their holdings. Only recently they have increased their holding in Montevideo. My information is that they became an active factor five years ago. What I am describing is the condition within the last five years, and a great deal of it I have no doubt is within the intimate knowledge of my friend from Kansas.

Sulzberger & Co., which has now changed its name to Wilson & Co., admits that, besides owning packing houses in Kansas City, New York, Chicago, Oklahoma City, Los Angeles, Albert Lea, Minn., Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and Natchez, Miss., in this country, it has two plants in South America—one at Buenos Aires, Argentina, and the other in Sao Paulo, Brazil. In addition to this, it has 135 distributing houses in America.

Swift & Co. has a number of packing houses in South America and in Australia, and Armour & Co. are equally well provided. In 1903 four of the big packers, to wit, Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Libbey, McNeill & Libbey, and Nelson Morris & Co., formed what was known as the National Packing Co. It seems that two of the important concerns, to wit, Swartzschild & Sulzberger Co. and Cudahy Co., were left out. During the great Beef Trust trial in Chicago, in 1912, the National Packing Co. was voluntarily dissolved by the parties to it. It had already been indicted in the Federal courts, but the packers claimed that it was not dissolved to escape the indictment. At all events, the various packing houses and distributing plants belonging to the National Packing Co. were made over to Armour, Swift, and Morris, as follows:

To Armour & Co. (a) Plants taken over: Anglo-American Provision Co., Chicago; Stockyards Warehouse Co., Chicago; Fowler Packing Co., Kansas City; Hammond Packing Co., St. Joseph; Ruddy Bros., Kansas City; Colorado Packing & Provision Co., Denver; Fowler's Canadian Co. Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware, although it may be outside of his discussion that he has entered into, that the packers have been engaged of late in absorbing the chicken and butter and egg industry and that it has assumed large proportions.

Mr. BORLAND. That is true, and I have a reference to that later. It is almost a food trust instead of a beef trust.

Mr. RAINEY. Is the gentleman aware that they have also gone into the baking business, and they have now established a large commercial bakery?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and they are not only entering into the control of the wheat supply, but the corn supply and the cottonseed-oil supply.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The facts the gentleman sets forth are of serious import, and I have been wondering while listening to him whether we have ample law on the statute books now to control such absorptions of business as he seems to indicate.

Mr. BORLAND. I assume from results that we have not, and I am going to refer in a few moments to a resolution—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Have we not sufficient anti-trust laws to cover cases of this kind?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not find that they are able to reach this international combination.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the Attorney General been approached on this subject?

Mr. BORLAND. Of course he has, and he actually tried a case in Chicago, but was defeated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he has been unable to separate these gentlemen?

Mr. BORLAND. That was not the present Attorney General, but a former Attorney General. It was in 1912 that that case was tried.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Without taking advantage of the political situation—

Mr. BORLAND. I do not regard this as political.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We pay more in the great cities for the beef that we buy, and if we have laws on the statute books to reach that situation, why can we not get some relief?

Mr. BORLAND. I am unable to give the gentleman the answer that his question deserves. I know his question comes from the heart and that it is not political. I do not assume that the fact that we failed to convict the packers in Chicago was a question of politics at all, but I do assume from that fact that we have not the necessary remedial laws for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I have been listening very earnestly and intently to what the gentleman has stated, and his foundation statement, to start with, seems to me to explain the whole situation, does it not?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. HILL. That the range has been crowded out by the homesteader and as a result the range has disappeared and the supply of cattle has fallen off.

Mr. BORLAND. No. I am very glad the gentleman called my attention to that if it is not clear to him. I started out by discounting all of the questions that might affect the price of cattle. I admit that the range has disappeared. I admit that there is a natural shortage. I admit there is an extraordinary demand, but I do not concede that those factors alone account for this situation.

Mr. HILL. Oh, I do not suppose so.

Mr. BORLAND. I point out the fact that the packers increased enormously their business when the general business in live stock was depressed.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that in addition to the falling off of the supply these men have gone to the Argentine, where the supply is increasing instead of falling off, and they have thus been able to maintain their foreign trade from the Argentine instead of here?

Mr. BORLAND. They claim so.

Mr. HILL. And is it not also true that we are importing meats to a very considerable extent—I know we are—from the Argentine and from Australia and New Zealand, free of duty, and that fact must tend somewhat to the increasing of the shortage here? I do not ask that question with any political end in view. Was not the gentleman's first statement with which he opened his very clear speech, a statement of the whole proposition, that the homesteader had crowded out the range man, that the supply of meat itself had fallen off?

Mr. BORLAND. I know that is true, and I give full weight to these changing conditions in decreasing the supply, but the decrease of supply has been accompanied by a large increase in the capitalization and profits and the activities of five packing houses.

Mr. HILL. Supposing it is—

Mr. BORLAND. Just let me finish. I assume this, which the cattlemen themselves are convinced of, that the oppressive operations of the Beef Trust, if there be a Beef Trust, have tended to further emphasize that natural condition of shortness of supply. In other words, the cattlemen finding themselves almost against a closed market are not increasing normally to the extent they could and should increase the production of cattle in this country.

Mr. HILL. Do the cattlemen control the production?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. That is entirely aside from the question of foreign competition. It is perfectly manifest that if the cattle raiser finds that he has a closed market he will not increase his operations, and that has been the result in the last five years.

Mr. HILL. Oh, I think the gentleman showed a very great decrease in the cattle supply in 10 or 15 years—from fifty-five million down to forty in that period.

Mr. BORLAND. I showed that in the period of 10 years there were 9,000,000 less cattle.

Mr. HILL. Would not that of itself explain the necessity for these men who had their capital engaged in business to branch out in other lines of business, and find the opportunity to do so, and that the capital had been increased. It certainly would not take as much capital to handle 40,000,000 as it would 55,000,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me say to my friend, that if he has some idea the tariff on cattle has been of any value to the farmer, he will find that under the Dingley law, from 1900 to 1910, there was a large decrease in the number of native stock, and at that time there was a duty of 27½ per cent ad valorem on cattle, also a duty on hides, and other duties of that kind; so that the existence of a tariff, which was a pretty good sized tariff, 27½ per cent, did not stay the onward march of this beef depression. How is a tariff going to help the cattle men when the foreign market is in the same hands as the home market? Most of the cattle men have abandoned the idea that a tariff is a remedy.

Mr. HILL. I did not make that suggestion with any such thought at all. I simply made the suggestion that the transfer of your foreign trade to the other countries was the fundamental feature of this proposition. They were trying to decrease their expenses, and the falling off in cattle had increased prices.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not so concede. I know in this country we have an ample supply of blue grass and running water, a temperate climate, and we are capable of producing a very large amount of cattle and a better class of cattle and more cattle to the acre than can be produced upon the ranges of Argentina.

Mr. HILL. But at a higher cost than on the ranges.

Mr. BORLAND. In the first place, we have an immediate market. We are close to the market for cattle, instead of having to transfer them overseas in order to sell them. Now, the small farmer can not afford to buy cattle and give a chattel mortgage and feed them his own feed or his neighbor's feed and put them on the market unless he knows that he is to have an open, fair market. That is the matter in a nutshell.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some years ago we had an inquiry in the District of Columbia as to the high cost of living, and my recollection is clear that Dr. Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Bureau of Agriculture, then testified that the packers of the country controlled less than 50 per cent of the output.

Mr. BORLAND. When was that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was about eight years ago, in the District of Columbia, and I would like to inquire—

Mr. BORLAND. I said in 1915 they controlled 70 per cent, so there has been an increase in the control since then.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was in evidence that the packers of the country controlled less than 50 per cent of the output. That is to say, there was sufficient independence to save the small butchers and slaughterhouses, which controlled more than half of the business of the United States. That statement was very significant at that time, and I would like to know whether the gentleman has any information as to whether there has been any change.

Mr. BORLAND. I just referred to it. I say in 1915 they controlled 70 per cent of all the cattle slaughtered under Federal supervision, which means all the cattle that enter into interstate commerce, so there has been an increase in the control. I am talking about 1915.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Recently in my State two of the leading small cities are cooperating to establish small packing houses, as it were, on a cooperative or community basis. Personally I have great hope for these two concerns, and I was going to ask the gentleman if he knows that any such movement is under way in any other section of the country, or in the West in the great cattle-growing section?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know of such a movement that has gotten beyond the mere proposition. I do not know of any that have materialized into results.

Mr. LEVER. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the probable outcome of such an undertaking?

Mr. BORLAND. Now, if the gentleman wants my opinion, as being raised almost in the shadow of a packing house, I would say that as far as the output of dressed beef is concerned, fresh meat, and as far as the output of packed pork is concerned, the local butchers and local slaughterhouses can do very well.

There is a large amount of by-products of the animal which can only be controlled profitably on a large basis. The gentleman will recognize that. The hides are of some value; but the hides are controlled by the tanneries, and the tanneries are controlled by the packers. They have both the foreign hides and the domestic hides. The curled-hair business is of value, and the hoof-and-horn business is valuable, and the glue business is valuable, as is also the soap business. These various businesses are incidental to the cattle business, and on account of that the big packer has a great advantage. But in spite of that advantage, he does not seem to be able to undersell the local slaughterhouse. I believe there is a local market for dressed beef and packed pork.

Mr. LEVER. But the local slaughterhouses would have to count off a part of the profit which they would lose on the by-products?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. In the year 1915 the market on live stock was much demoralized and the cattle raisers claimed that they were losing an average of $15 a head on account of the increased cost of production and the comparatively low price of live animals on the market. They believed then and still believe that there was unmistakable evidence of manipulation of the markets by the great packers. The consumers were paying high prices for beef; there was an enormous foreign demand caused by the war in Europe; there was a shortage of cattle in this country, and yet importations into this country had virtually ceased, because of the pressing demand in Europe, and exportations from this country had greatly increased.

In 1914 there were exported from this country 85,000,000 pounds of beef and beef products; in 1915, 375,000,000 pounds, an increase equivalent to 527,000 head of live cattle. In 1914 there were imported into this country 756,000 head; in 1915 only 562,000 head. In 1914 there were slaughtered in this country 6,756,000 head; in 1915, 7,153,395.

It will be seen that the increase of our exports would have about consumed all of our imported cattle for the year 1915. All of the factors were present, according to the law of supply and demand, for an increased price of both cattle and beef; but, strange to say, we find an increased price of beef and a decreased price of cattle, setting at defiance all of the law of supply and demand. Cattle on the hoof in 1915 ran nearly $1 a hundred lower at the great live-stock centers of the country than in 1914.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman explain to us how they do that? I know the gentleman is right about it.

Mr. BORLAND. We had some hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, and this is what developed: One of the shippers said, "Yes; we shipped 80 head of cattle to the market and they were sold to one buyer. He did not come out until 11 o'clock in the morning. No buyers came out until telegrams came from Chicago. Then all the buyers came out." Then, as the shipper said, "They bought my 80 head of cattle. I got but one bid, and the commission man said, 'You had better take it, or they will make you hold it over until next day.' I found when the bids came in that the cattle were evenly divided; 40 went to Morris and 40 went to Armour. They were all bought at one price."

Mr. QUIN. It is the trust, then, that fixes the price of cattle, and one man buys the beef?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. A shipper by the name of Wilson said, "If I shipped to Fort Worth and did not like the price, and I shipped to Kansas City and did not like the price, and then shipped on to Chicago, they would wire on me, 'Do not offer any more on those cattle.'" That is the testimony. You gentlemen who are interested in the subject should read that. It is well worth reading.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can corroborate what the gentleman stated, I having been at one time, unfortunately to myself, interested in the cattle-shipping business; and while my interest was small, the concern was somewhat large, having a trainload of cattle at one time. We were warned not to ship to Chicago, because we would get a less price at Chicago than we would get at Omaha; but, unfortunately, we shipped to Chicago and did get a less price.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the gentleman mean that the man named Wilson received less for his cattle at Chicago than at Fort Worth, and he would be out the freight from Fort Worth to Chicago?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that was his statement.

The evidence that something was radically wrong was so clear that the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture of the United States Government called a conference at Chicago in October, 1915, of all branches of the live-stock industry, in the hope of being able by voluntary cooperation to get at the cause of the demoralized condition of the market.

Men interested in all branches of the trade attended this meeting—ranchmen, farmers, stock feeders, shippers, independent butchers, commission merchants, and State and Government officials. Everybody came but the packers. They snapped their fingers at the whole proceeding and insisted there was nothing to investigate. Of course, the conference came to nothing. It was like the play of Hamlet without the melancholy Dane. The packers are a necessary element in any investigation of the live-stock industry.

But the cattlemen did not cease their efforts. The Missouri Cattle, Swine, & Sheep Feeders' Association adopted strong resolutions demanding that Congress provide some way of investigating the control of the packers over the live-stock market. In January I introduced my resolution to refer the investigation to the Federal Trade Commission, which was created by Congress to do precisely this kind of work. The law expressly gives either House of Congress the power to require the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report upon any alleged violations of the antitrust law. The teeth in this proposition is that the Federal Trade Commission is not dependent upon voluntary statements furnished by the packers nor statistics gathered by special agents, but it can compel the production of testimony under oath and under the penalties of perjury.

The resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee and has been pending before that committee for six months. After the resolution was introduced the Texas Cattle Raisers' Association and numerous other State and local bodies indorsed it. It was also actively supported by the American National Live Stock Association and by the National Live Stock Exchange. This latter is the national body of the live-stock commission dealers.

We have had hearings on the resolution, at which representatives of all the great live-stock organizations of the country have appeared at their own expense to urge the adoption of the resolution. The packers have also appeared by their chief officers and by their attorneys. This is the first time that the packers have voluntarily taken part in such a hearing, but they have fought this resolution every inch of the way and seem determined to defeat it openly or kill it by delay. To prevent consideration of the resolution would of course be a victory for the packers. Meanwhile, however, the live-stock market has been going steadily up, and to-day the cattle market is much better than it was a year ago. The same power which could put the cattle market down in 1915 and put it up in 1916 while this resolution was pending, could put it down again if the resolution were defeated.

As soon as the hearings closed the packers began a country-wide propaganda among the commission men and cattle raisers to secure letters and telegrams to Members of Congress opposing the adoption of the resolution, on the ground that the market was now good and any agitation would demoralize business. Just why the packers should worry over the possible harm that might come to the cattle men is not clear, but the answer to their contention is very clear; namely, that the market was demoralized in 1915 when there was no investigation pending. The market became much better in 1916 during the course of these hearings. If the reverse had been true and the market had been good in 1915, but became demoralized after the resolution was introduced, there might be some ground for the packers' argument.

The truth is that the packers are bitterly opposing any form of investigation at any time by anybody.

Do you want to know why they are so bitterly opposing it?

I will give you the answer in a nutshell.

According to the Wall Street Journal, in the year 1915 while the farmers and stock raisers were almost going bankrupt on account of the low price of cattle, and while the consumer was paying war prices for his beef, Swift & Co. declared a dividend of 18.7 per cent on their capital stock; Armour, 55 per cent; Morris, 77.3 per cent; and Cudahy, 17.6 per cent. In 1914 Swift & Co., after paying a dividend on its capital stock of $5,250,000, placed $4,200,000 to surplus. In 1915, after paying a like dividend, they placed $8,650,000 to surplus.

Armour & Co. showed net earnings in 1914 of $7,400,000, and in 1915, $11,000,000.

Are these people eager for an investigation of the live-stock industry and the production of meat animals in this country? Apparently they are not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can the gentleman tell me the prevailing fashionable price at this time paid by the packers and butchers for ordinary cattle on the hoof, such as we get the whip leather out of and such as they sell us to eat in Washington?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; the price at Kansas City ranges now from $6.50 for cows, and that sort of stuff, up to fat beef, which brings $10.60 and sometimes $10.80.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then it ranges from $7 to $11?

Mr. BORLAND. No; not quite $11. I think it did touch $11 at St. Louis.

Mr. ADAMSON. Averaging about $8 a hundred?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman of course is aware, and I believe he states, that every particle of the animal, hide, hair, hoof, entrails, all are utilized by the facilities these people have?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; they do not lose anything except the squeal of the pig.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is also aware that when you buy first-class beefsteak you pay about 40 cents a pound?

Mr. BORLAND. About 35 to 38 or 40 cents.

Mr. ADAMSON. And all parts run from 18 to 40 cents.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman does not think it remarkable, does he, that the intermediary is able to declare a considerable dividend with this wide margin?

Mr. BORLAND. Apparently not.

Mr. ADAMSON. And that they can afford to bring lawyers here to maintain a condition which enables them to swindle both ways?

Mr. BORLAND. Apparently they can.

Mr. ADAMSON. And rob both consumer and producer.

Mr. BORLAND. Are these people eager for an investigation of the live-stock industry and the production of animals in this country? Apparently they are not.

But this is not all. The evidence given at the hearings, including the admission of the packers themselves, shows that the packers now own or control nearly everything that is valuable in connection with the live-stock business. Not only are they practically the sole buyer for the farmers' cattle but the facilities for getting those cattle on the market are in the control of the packers, and they are also engaged in disposing through various subsidiary companies of the by-products from the horn comb to the brush of the tail. The evidence revealed that many of the stockyards in the great live-stock markets are controlled by the packers. They control the terminal companies, the rendering establishments which dispose of the carcasses of animals which die in the cars or in the yards, all grades of packing plants, the wholesale distributing markets, the cold-storage warehouses, and the refrigerator-car systems. They own the wholesale markets in the great cities and even the Smithfield Market of London, and from these markets they do not only a wholesale but a retail business to hotels, clubs, dining cars, and steamships.

They are engaged in the manufacture of fertilizer in all forms, including a large control of the supply of nitrate. They dispose through various agencies of all of the by-products of the animal. They are engaged in the manufacture of soap, oleomargarine, curled hair, combs, and other articles made from horns and hoofs, bone dust, dried blood, pharmaceutical preparations, and glue. They operate great tanneries, and control the hide and leather market. They are engaged in the manufacture of various kinds of packed and canned-food products, and are a large factor in the cold storage of butter, eggs, poultry, fresh fruit, and vegetables. They even manufacture grape juice.

I have already spoken of the fact that they control packing houses in Australia, Argentina, and Uruguay, and in connection therewith they have lines of steamers and dock facilities which make them almost immune from competition. In addition to this, they control or have an interest in a large number of banks and cattle loan companies which lend money to cattle feeders and take a chattel mortgage upon the bunch of cattle. Thus, they are able to practically force cattle on the market, and they are in possession at all times of accurate statistics of the number of cattle that must be shipped to market within a certain week. There is no guesswork about their business. Their control of a chain of banks extends from New York City to the smallest agricultural town.

When England seized a cargo of beef belonging to the packers which she claimed was on the way to Germany, the packers were able to force a settlement out of Great Britain of $15,000,000. How? The answer is very simple. England was preparing to negotiate a large war loan in this country and she needed the sympathetic help of the packers' banks. I could give a startling list, if necessary, of the banks upon the directory of which great packers figure. England may have been at the mercy of the packers in other respects, for she needs to place vast meat contracts to feed her Army in the field.

What do the cattlemen expect to gain by this investigation? And do they expect to bring to terms this great international organization? Well, in the first place, they feel that the white light of publicity is the principal weapon in the correction of economic wrongs. No legitimate business need fear honest and impartial publicity. If the packers expect to regain public confidence by stifling a public inquiry, they may find that the result is exactly the opposite of their expectations. In the next place, the cattlemen feel that the agencies and facilities of the live-stock business should not be all in the hands of the packers, and that possibly legislation is needed to divorce the packers from their control of the market facilities in the same way that the railroads were divorced from their control of commodities. And, lastly, the cattlemen expect for the benefit, both of themselves and their consumers, to restore, if it is possible in this economic age in the world, a free and open market. I believe that a free market is the most wholesome thing for any business. The grain farmer to-day has a free and open market on wheat in the great grain centers like Kansas City, Minneapolis, and Chicago, and we see how much better off he is than his brother, the tobacco farmer of the South, who has no open market, but must sell his crop as soon as it is gathered to one buyer, the American Tobacco Co. The result is that the tobacco farmer has been trying night riding and other desperate forms of law breaking to force a living price for his product.

I believe that great markets with their exchanges and their forces of active and alert salesmen is the steady force in any industry. The commission men are an absolutely essential factor of a free, open, and competitive live-stock market, and when the live-stock markets are destroyed and the exchanges are closed, the cattle raiser will be perfectly helpless. Country buying by the packers may at first benefit a few stock raisers, but in the end it will place all stock raisers at the mercy of the packers, and be the most disastrous thing which could possibly happen to the live-stock industry.

In conclusion, let me say that the true interests of all men engaged in the live-stock industry lie in the direction of building up that industry and increasing it to the highest possible efficiency. Even the interests of the packers are ultimately to the same end. Certainly the interests of our Nation at large and of the great army of wage earners and consumers who must rely upon our domestic supply of beef is in the interest of developing our meat industry and preserving it, not only from great world-wide economic changes but from the manipulation of those powerful bands who sit at the gate of commerce and demand a toll from the food of the people. [Applause.]

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 3, 1916.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 1, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are only five Senators in the Chamber. I think we ought to have a quorum before we begin the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Sherman
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Simmons
Beckham	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Brandeggee	James	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Smoot
Clapp	Kenyon	Penrose	Taggart
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pittman	Vardaman
Culberson	Lane	Ransdell	Wardman
Dillingham	McCumber	Robinson	Williams
Fletcher	McLean	Saulsbury
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. TILLMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is necessarily absent, and that he is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

I also desire to announce the absence on account of illness of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The next reserved amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amendment reserved by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], striking out on page 28, lines 18, 19, and 20, in the following words:

Repave with asphalt the roadway of Fourteenth Street NW., from Pennsylvania Avenue to F Street, 70 feet wide, $7,500.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment which will strike out, in lines 18 and 19 and a portion of line 20, the proposition as it came from the House to repave with asphalt the roadway of Fourteenth Street NW., from Pennsylvania Avenue to F Street, 70 feet wide. That is the House provision, and on recommendation of the committee the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck it out. I find in the bill other instances where repavement has been ordered, but this seems to be eliminated. I have received very many letters and a number of calls with reference to this matter. I did not know anything about it until I went down there and looked the premises over.

This part of Fourteenth Street is that section with the Willard Hotel on one side and the Ebbitt House on the other. The section runs from Pennsylvania Avenue to F Street. I find that Fourteenth Street on the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue is 75 feet wide. I find that Fourteenth Street on the other side of F Street is 75 feet wide. This section is but 50 feet wide.

The reason why this should be the case seems almost inexplicable. Recently, within a year or thereabouts, a two-track street railroad has been laid in that portion of Fourteenth Street between F Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, narrowing up the street still more. It is a very common instance, almost an everyday instance, that the side of the Avenue toward the Willard Hotel will be glutted by taxicabs and automobiles, 12 or 15 in number, belonging, I believe, to the Willard Hotel, occupying the street as a stand. On the opposite side of Fourteenth Street, in the front of the other property, there are these great caravans, so-called sight-seeing caravans, occupying that portion of the street. So with a two-track railroad and with automobiles on one side and caravans on the other the street is narrowed to a very great degree.

Further than this, the physical condition which prevails there is a very rapid incline on that portion of Fourteenth Street, making it very dangerous and a very uncomfortable situation. It seems to me if there is any reason for a wide street that reason exists in this particular part.

After I had gone there I examined the sidewalk. I found the sidewalk on that portion of Fourteenth Street 30 to 33 feet in width on both sides, which is an unusual width anywhere in the city. Since that time the commissioner of the District, Commissioner Newman, I need not have any hesitancy in saying, called upon me and said he had seen I had brought up this question. I said, "Yes." I asked him what he knew about it. He said he knew very little about it. He said, "I am a commissioner of the District; this is an aggravating condition; the condition has remained for years, and it should be corrected. I can not understand just what reason the Senate had for striking this out, relieving these property holders from the assessment that would come and at the same time jeopardizing the people." The commissioner said in the event of an accident, which would be liable to occur at any time, with the cluttering up of the automobiles and the two-track railroad, the city would be liable, of course, for such damages as might accrue.

This property, I learned afterwards, is owned by the Willards. I do not know the Willards from a side of sole leather. I would not know them if I stumbled on any of them. I have no feeling regarding the Willards, but I find the Willards have for many years occupied all that portion of the sidewalk. I stopped there to-day in order to qualify myself to speak of it. I found on about 12 feet of that sidewalk a sort of derrick framework from the elevator that punched through the sidewalk standing up 8 feet high, making an opportunity to go down to their vaults below the street. I asked a man what that was for. He said, "It is the Willard elevator to carry up and down the freight of the Willard." Then I asked, "What are these coal holes along here?" He said, "The boilers are under there." I said, "Are these boilers on private property or on public property?" He said, "They are on public property." "How long have they been there?" I asked him. He said, "I do not know; forever, I guess." And there they are, occupying this territory, and scarcely a foot ever treads on that portion of the Fourteenth Street sidewalk. That excess of 10 or 12 feet is entirely utilized by private interests, by a private concern, the Willard Hotel Co.

The Willard Hotel Co. own that property, and the Willard estate own practically all the other property on the other side of the street. They own the Ebbitt House and three or four other buildings clear down to the saloon on the corner, and I am in doubt whether they own that or not. But they own above the saloon, and I want to know with what reason or decency or sense of fairness Congress can go on and make assessments to repave with asphalt the roadway of Twelfth Street NW., from E to F Streets, 45 feet wide, at a cost of $6,600; to repave with asphalt the roadway of Third Street NW., from Pennsylvania Avenue to B Street south, $13,800; to repave with asphalt the granite block roadway of Seventh Street NW., from R Street to Florida Avenue, $15,000; and for repaving the roadway of B Street NW., from Ninth Street to Twelfth Street, on plans to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $28,000, and then when we come to the other paragraph it is cut out. It may inconvenience them by disturbing this vertical frame or elevator that they have fixed upon the sidewalk, and it may inconvenience them with their boilers. Some gentleman told me they have a sort of certificate or permit to place that there. I said, "Did the city ever surrender the right to that property?" "Oh, no; they have simply been occupying it by sufferance." Yet I learned this same company has been charging automobile owners and taxicabs for rental for the privilege of standing along there on the city's property. Whether that be true or not I do not know, but I was so informed.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the width of this street along the Willard Hotel?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The width of the whole street is legitimately 75 feet.

Mr. OVERMAN. What width are they occupying?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They are occupying about 13 feet of each sidewalk.

Mr. OVERMAN. How much of the other part of the street are they occupying?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. About 20 feet.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the distance between the curbs?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think about 36 feet; and it should be 50 feet.

Mr. OVERMAN. How much Government property do they occupy?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think about 12 feet on each sidewalk. They occupy 12 feet of the sidewalk along Willard's Hotel from Pennsylvania Avenue to F Street, and on the opposite side they own the Ebbitt House and all the other property.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have no title whatever to the occupancy of the pavement?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. None whatever. It is just simply occupancy.

Mr. President, I have no desire to oppress the Willards. I do not know them, and if I did it would not make any difference. I do not think it is square. We assess the local people all over the city for these improvements. Why, in the name of God, should we exempt the Willards? I can not understand it.

It struck me as being so apparent a wrong that, as I said, I visited the premises; and I have since been visited by the commissioner, who, as I tell you, said to me that since the two railroad tracks have been there—and they were put there quite recently; I think about a year ago—it has really circumscribed the legitimate and proper area of driving. As I said, the physical condition is such that there is a grade of 15 or 20 per cent. Under ordinary conditions it would be bad, and the commissioner said when it is cluttered up with taxicabs on one side and great caravans of sight-seeing conveyances on the other side, with two tracks of railroad, it is very much circumscribed, and it is an unfortunate and dangerous condition. It seems to me the Senate can not justify this action, and therefore I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment striking out that paragraph of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say that, as I remember, the engineer commissioner of the District came before the committee prior to the laying of the tracks on Fourteenth Street between Pennsylvania Avenue and F Street and asked Congress to lessen the width of the sidewalks on that square so that the tracks could be laid. That involved great expense, and Congress did not authorize the lessening of the width of the sidewalks; but the hotel company are using this property on the side of the Willard Hotel that belongs to the Government, and the sidewalks on that block are very wide.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They are 33 feet wide.

Mr. OVERMAN. Above that block on Fourteenth Street for miles the sidewalks are of a uniform width.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I paced the sidewalk on that block, Mr. President, and it is from 30 to 33 feet wide.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, has the Senator from New Jersey concluded?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I was on the committee that had this matter under consideration, and I voted to strike out the provision contained in the House bill. I do not know the Willard Hotel people; I never saw one of them nor any person who is interested in that hotel; but I understand it is going to cost some $28,000 to the Willard Hotel Co. if this change is made. While that is not all powerful in the determination of what should be done in the widening of a street, yet, notwithstanding, it is something which we ought to take into consideration.

The complaint which the Senator says has been made is that a number of vehicles are stationed along the side of the Willard Hotel. The Commissioners of the District have a perfect right to see that no vehicle is stationed there, and they can do it without the expenditure of a dollar to anybody. If they do that, they can save the expenditure and have plenty of space upon each side of the railroad tracks for vehicles.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Was not the Senator's attention called to the fact that the stand for vehicles is now on Pennsylvania Avenue?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; I was going to refer to that. In front of the Willard Hotel there is a space, extending for almost a block, where automobiles are parked. In addition to that, they can stand for any distance on Pennsylvania Avenue, because it is a very wide street. Consequently, it seems to me, when you say you want this change made solely for the purpose of having more space, when it can be done in 10 minutes simply by the issuance of an order by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, it is unfair to put anybody to an expenditure of such an amount as has been named.

Mr. OVERMAN. How long has it been occupying this Government property?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. It is generally customary in cities to permit the use of space underneath the street for coal, boilers, and so forth, and many cities permit it even to the lot line.

Mr. OVERMAN. The other hotels on that same street have their boilers under the sidewalk, and they do not pay for the use of such spaces.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be. I presume they do it under a permit. The difficulty is that here there is going to be an enormous expenditure of money, and it seems to me that it is useless, for the difficulty can be obviated by a simple order of the commissioners that vehicles shall not stand in front of that hotel on either side.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I thought the Senator was referring to the permit from the Government to use the space under the sidewalk.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I find from the evidence taken before the subcommittee that the first permit was issued by the War Department on April 5, 1900, for one part of the vault, and the second one on November 12, 1902. The first one was signed by Mr. Meiklejohn, Assistant Secretary of War at that time, and the second one was signed by Gen. W. Carey Sanger, Acting Secretary of War at the time it was obtained. Those vaults were put in under those permits.

Mr. SHAFROTH. To require an expenditure of $28,000 to be made by the abutting property owners under a permit which was evidently not intended to be temporary only, it seems to me, is a great hardship on them; and while the hotel company charges high prices, and all that—and I have no love for high-priced hotels—yet, notwithstanding that fact, I believe that justice ought to be done to them.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason against such action. In this bill it is provided that the street shall be paved with asphalt. With the steep grade of Fourteenth Street, such a pavement would simply be a trap for dragging down horses in slippery weather, whenever there is rain or snow. It seems to me that if such a proposition were adopted there would be infinitely a greater number of accidents than now occur. The present street pavement is ideal in that steep place. No accidents occur there; but if that street is paved with asphalt on that steep grade you are going to have any number of accidents, and perhaps any number of damage suits against the District of Columbia, by reason of putting down a pavement of that kind, which, I repeat, would be a trap for horses that were passing along there.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator speaks about automobiles parking along there. Of course that is a mere incident; but as to the suggestion in regard to paving the street with asphalt, I quite agree with the Senator. I should like to see an amendment—and I shall offer an amendment to that effect—requiring that it should be paved with Belgian block and not with asphalt. I think Belgian block would be far better; but whether the street is paved with Belgian block or with asphalt, the fact is that these people are occupying these streets, and are being given an advantage over the people on other portions of Fourteenth Street. No one can argue, and no practical man would argue, that with a street with two railroad tracks on it it would not be safer to have that additional width rather than to have it narrower.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is true that perhaps it would be a little advantage; but with that steep grade there is no place for vehicles to stand, and they ought not to be permitted to stand there.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Would it not be better to widen the street, however, if they are to stand there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it would be, if they are to stand there.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, they are on Pennsylvania Avenue. In front of the Willard Hotel for nearly a block the street is filled with parked automobiles, and there is no space for them there. They come up to the very edge of Fourteenth Street.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They can easily be prohibited from doing so, and the commissioners can compel them to park automobiles some distance away.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not talking about parking automobiles. I think we safely may leave that with the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The provision in the House bill is for an asphalt pavement. If there is an asphalt pavement there, in wet weather or in snow the automobiles will continually skid, even with chains on them. The grade is very steep. I do not know a place in the city of Washington where the grade is so steep as between Pennsylvania Avenue and F Street on Fourteenth Street. It is now paved with granite blocks.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. With Belgian blocks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Although with the existing pavement horses can go along that portion of Fourteenth Street without endangering their lives and automobiles can pass up and down without any danger to them, it seems to me, if we make this change we would be inviting disaster to people, we would be subjecting the District to damage suits, and we would be damaging adjacent property because people have invested large amounts of money there with the expectation that no change would be made, at least for a reasonable length of time.

Mr. OVERMAN. How about Thirteenth Street, which is the next street—is not the grade about the same there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I do not think so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is about a 15 per cent grade.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The grade is not quite so steep on Thirteenth Street because, I think, F Street running to the east has a gradual down grade, making a somewhat slighter grade on Thirteenth Street than on Fourteenth Street.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Does the Senator know how many years the Willard Hotel Co. have occupied that space?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask that question because the Senator says they had a right to expect that they could occupy it for a reasonable length of time. They have occupied it ever since they built the new hotel, and they have never paid the District of Columbia one sou marque rental for it; and, God knows, they ought to be satisfied.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If you want to charge them for it, that is a different consideration.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I do not want to charge them for it; but I want the Willard Hotel Co. to be put on the same footing with the people on the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue and the people on the other side of F Street.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not believe that the permit has been given through any favoritism.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not know that it has been.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not believe that is the case; but in order to make that change an expenditure of money will be required which will necessitate a tax on that hotel of $28,000.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, no, it is not so much as that. How does the Senator arrive at the figure $28,000?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, it will involve the destruction of property that has cost them $28,000.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is true; but if you put your house on my lot—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us have some little semblance of parliamentary procedure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if the Senator puts his house on my lot he must pay the expense of moving it off.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. And this company did not go in there with their eyes shut. They knew they were on public property. I do not know the Willard Hotel people; I would not know them if I fell over them. I know that certain interests own the hotel and lease it out to Mr. Boldt, who runs the Waldorf-Astoria, in New York; the Marlborough-Blenheim, in Atlantic City; and the Bellevue-Stratford, in Philadelphia. A millionaire hotel proprietor rents it out, and the owners of the property are sure of their revenue every year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not know the hotel people, nor do I care who they are. The vote I cast in the committee was not, and the vote I shall cast on the floor shall not be, influenced by whether they are poor men or rich men. As I understand, $28,000 has been expended there and will be destroyed if the action sought by the Senator from New Jersey is taken. What benefits are going to accrue by widening that street? The grade is too steep for automobiles to stand there, even if the street were widened. The commissioners can remedy any condition of congestion by an order. An asphalt pavement would render the street dangerous not only to horses but also to automobiles. For that reason I believe it would be a useless expenditure of money, and I think the Senate amendment striking out the provision should prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, in regard to the question of rejecting the amendment reported by the committee striking out the provision inserted by the House, I wish to say we fully considered the matter in the committee. We found no special public sentiment in favor of this change. We recognized the fact that this street has been repaved within the last year.

So far as the argument is concerned as to the use of the space under the street, there is nothing in that, because, I presume, there are a hundred other cases of a similar character where cellars are being used under the streets. That is not a privilege that is extended to the Willard Hotel Co. alone. Under the circumstances, we felt that it probably would be better to strike out the House provision and let the matter go to conference, so that we might determine what was best to do in the matter after consulting with those having knowledge of the circumstances and ascertaining the reason the House had for inserting the provision for the widening of Fourteenth Street.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the question raised by the amendment offered by me proposing to abolish the District of Columbia and change the manner of paying the expenses of the District has been disposed of, and I did not expect to refer to it again; but in ruling upon the point of order on the amendment the Chair made the statement that the District of Columbia was not a municipal corporation, a statement that was literally correct, except that it is nominally so, not for municipal but for national governmental purposes. That ruling has been brought in question by a letter that was written to a Member of this body—not myself—in which the correctness of the statement referred to is challenged, and in support of the claim made in the letter a brief is referred to which was filed in the case of Leonard R. Coates against the District of Columbia in an action brought against the District for damages.

It was claimed as a defense in that action that in doing the act complained of the District of Columbia acted in a governmental capacity and in the performance of a governmental function or duty. The court held, and I think properly held, that the District was then in the performance of a governmental function or duty, but not as a municipality. The governmental function performed was that of the National Government and not of a municipality. While the Congress of the United States has, as the act of 1878 provides, continued the District as a municipality, it has shorn it of every vestige of power or authority as such, and has simply made it the agent of the Government for the performance of National Government functions, and nothing else. In effect, the Congress has made the District of Columbia its agent for a certain purpose, has provided that it may sue and be sued as such agent; but the action is, in effect, against the Government of the United States and not against the District of Columbia as a municipal corporation, and any judgment that is recovered against the District must be paid out of the National Government funds, and comes out of the National Treasury. Therefore, it is idle to say that in any proper sense the District of Columbia is a municipal government, because it performs no functions of that character.

I have felt impelled to make this statement, Mr. President, because of the fact that the Chair has been challenged as to the statement made, and because I believe that the Chair was eminently right, not only in the statement of facts but in the ruling that was made. I have no doubt of that myself; and there is absolutely nothing in the brief in the Coates case and nothing in the ruling of the court in that case that challenges the correctness of the statement made by the Chair respecting the character of the functions of the District of Columbia or the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that there may be injustice in the use of public property by private individuals, namely, where an individual secures it for the purpose of renting it to others for profit. Many cities, practically all of them—and it is necessary that they should—under certain conditions grant the right to large buildings to use the space under sidewalks, but in Chicago and other cities I am informed they charge a rental for it, and in that way they secure quite a considerable revenue, which is proper and right. The Willard Hotel people, I understand, have secured a permit to this space under the sidewalk and pay nothing for it. It has been a gift to them, a grant to them under, I presume, a limited permit, and they are said to turn around and rent it out for gain. There is an unearned increment, and they have nothing left to say in the way of a rebuke to the public when it undertakes to recover enough of that ground for the use of the people who live in this city. Their voice is stopped entirely.

As to the width of the street, I know nothing. I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado that it would be foolish to pave a steep street with asphaltum. You might just as well coat it with ice; it would be a dangerous thoroughfare for people and for vehicles of all kinds in wet weather; but when it comes down to the right to the use of the public property, that is another question which should be taken into respectful consideration. No man has an inalienable right to take unto himself the property of the people as a gift, on a permit, and then turn around and rent it out for somebody else's use and pocket the proceeds.

I notice that there is a great deal of indignation expressed here whenever anyone begins to look out for the rights of the people. The people of the community should be the first to be considered and legislated for. The rights of special interests should come afterwards. But if anybody calls attention to a wrong being done to the general public, such as an overcharge for gas, such as was discussed yesterday, or for an inferior quality of gas, loaded with acid which eats out the pipes and insidiously poisons thousands of people, then the cry is, "Hush! Say nothing; lie low and keep still. Mum's the word!" from the superpatriots who cast reflections upon those who call attention to conditions which are wrong and unjust—the types of wrongs which must be discovered and corrected sooner or later or there will come trouble from an outraged people. They will not always stand for infringements upon their common property and their rights.

I think this particular matter is one of no great importance, but, just the same, it is along the line of many usurpations of the people's property; and yet, and as usual, there is a burst of indignation when some one calls attention to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in relation to the rentals that should be charged by the cities for the use of their streets. I believe in that; but I do not believe in picking out one place and saying, "Here, you have got to be subjected to a loss of $28,000 simply for the purpose of widening a street," which it is not necessary to have widened, in my judgment. I do not believe in doing that.

I would join with the Senator in making a provision that wherever any part of a street is used by adjacent buildings it shall pay a reasonable rental, and I think that is right.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he does not believe this: In view of the fact that these buildings have the privilege of using that space, is it not a fact that when the taxes are laid upon these buildings the taxes are probably greater, having the privileges that they have, and do they not pay for those privileges in the way of taxation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. They do to some extent, but—

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That is the view the committee took of it; that if you increase the value of a building by virtue of its having these subways or these cellars, the building is worth more money and the owners pay greater taxes upon it than they otherwise would.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe, however, that the rule which has been adopted in Chicago, as I understand, is the best rule; and that provides that whoever occupies land in a street adjacent to his property shall pay a reasonable rental. I do not, however, believe in doing that by a special act with reference to one particular piece of property. I believe in making it a general rule, by which people will know in advance that when they use that public space and get permits for its use they will be required to pay, and for that reason I think it is all right. But to pick out a particular piece of property and say: "Here, we are going to enforce this requirement against this piece of property, with a resulting loss of $28,000, and we will not disturb another man perhaps within half a block of that place," it seems to me is manifestly unfair.

Or, that account I believe that we ought not to change this condition. Why, this street has just been paved, I am told, one year ago. Are you going to make them pay for doing it again now? The expense of that is assessed against the property owners to some extent, I understand.

Mr. LANE. I will ask the Senator this question: Does not the Government in part appropriate for this improvement?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; but the cost is paid half by the District and half by the Congress.

Mr. LANE. Then Congress and the Senate have half a right to say something about it, or to inquire into it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; that is right. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LANE. Just half a right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but at the same time I understand that a proportion of the cost of paving a street in the District of Columbia has to be paid for now by the abutting property owners. That is as it ought to be. That is the condition that has existed in other cities for years. At the same time, I do not believe in putting to useless expense people who have property, and I believe that the paving of that street in any other manner than it is paved now will be a detriment to the traveling public.

Mr. LANE. I think that can be remedied by the Senator from New Jersey qualifying his amendment, and providing for a suitable pavement; but the public streets are the property of the people. They are dedicated to the use of the public, and their rights are first, and first to be considered. Now, if in improving the street for the benefit of the public you damage the property owner to some extent by recovering from him certain public property which he has been using for nothing, for which he has paid not a cent, why, he must stand his share of the loss in the interest of the general community. There is not a leg for an argument to stand on upon any other ground.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That would be true, Mr. President, if there were any urgent necessity for this thing; but that is not a street where automobiles ought to be permitted to stand, or where vehicles of any kind ought to be permitted to stand. They ought to be required to park somewhere else; and the commissioners can by an order in 10 minutes require that to be done, and the result of it then is that the necessity for repaving is entirely abrogated.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams protesting against certain provisions in the revenue bill. Some of them are protests against the tax on copper, another a protest against the increased corporation tax on banks, and still other protests against the tax on munition manufacturers. I ask leave to present these telegrams and have them referred to the appropriate committee.

I have another set of telegrams relating to the same bill, protesting against some provisions affecting the wine industry of my State. I will read just one of them:

Understand Senate committee is working on wine bill, and that Missouri and Ohio are fighting for unlimited use of grain spirits, sugar, and water, with no Government supervision. The bill, with exception of rates and few minor changes, is satisfactory to American pure-wine interests, and we are anxious of upholding present regulations. Please use your influence to protect pure wines by indorsing the regulations of the wine revenue bill passed by the House.

I want to say that the chief concern of the wine growers of California is to prevent the passage of any provision that will allow the adulteration of wines, not so much the question of taxes.

I ask leave to submit these telegrams, and the same reference for them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegrams will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], I think, presents the thing in not exactly the true way, unwittingly. He says he does not believe in singling out some one. Now, there is no purpose of singling anybody out. That would be the last thing in my thoughts. Whatever else I am, I hope that I am square. I would not be a party to singling out any man on Fourteenth Street and oppressing him or punishing him, and I am not trying to single these men out; but for 7 miles or more Fourteenth Street, going up the hill, is 70 or 85 feet wide and on the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue it is 75 feet wide. These men have been singled out for favor in some way that I can not understand.

Now, I do not want to punish them. As I said before, I do not know the Willard family from a side of sole leather. Some man told me this morning that the Willards are Democrats and that they belong to the national committee. I do not care whether they are Democrats or Republicans, or what on earth they are. If they are in the wrong, I am going to fight them, and if they are in the right I will stand for them.

We are singling out nobody. We are only asking that fish shall not be made of one and fowl of the other; that the same kind of medicine that is doled out to the property owners on Fourteenth Street from one end to another, except on this isolated block, shall be the medicine for these gentlemen. Fortunately, I am told, they are in such a financial situation that they are pretty well able to bear it; but that has nothing to do with the question. If it is right, it is right; if it is wrong, it is wrong.

I agree thoroughly with the Senator's proposition about an asphalt pavement. I think it is a mistake. Any practical man will sustain that contention. I think the Belgian block or the trap-rock pavement which they have there is far better than asphalt; and if we can reject this amendment of the Senate committee I shall move to amend the provision so that instead of being asphalt it shall be Belgian block or in conformity with the existing pavement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that the Engineer Commissioner of the District came before us and asked us to do exactly what the House did—to make that great street uniform as to the pavements on each side, which are exactly alike for 7 miles except here. He said it was an outrage to have that street all exactly alike until you get to the Willard Hotel, and then to extend the sidewalk out, and have a narrow street there, when they are going to have two lines of railroad there.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is just what Commissioner Newman told me.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that the Engineer commissioner of the city, came down with his reasons and said that the street ought to be uniform all along. Here we are giving the use of the Government property to this hotel when the pavement ought to be widened and made the same for 7 miles.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think the Senator is eminently right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] refers to the revenue bill. While the Senate is deliberating upon the weighty question of which side of the street automobiles will be required to park on, and whether Fourteenth Street shall be paved with asphalt or granite block, and whether an awning on the sidewalk shall be removed, I want to take advantage of the opportunity, while Senators are conferring over those matters and the Nation waits in suspense, to speak of the matter to which the Senator from California refers, at least upon one phase of the revenue bill.

One of the important provisions of the bill provides for a so-called tariff commission. I say a so-called tariff commission, because the commission, as established in the bill, has no powers of any kind whatever to do any executive or administrative act. It is merely a board of inquiry. It is little more, as a matter of fact, than the Office of Cost of Production in the Department of Commerce, already established, which is referred to in the bill itself.

The bill provides for an appropriation of $300,000 as the initial appropriation for the expenses of this commission. It gives the so-called commission authority to commandeer other departments of the Government. These are the words of the bill:

That such departments and independent establishments of the Government shall cooperate fully with the commission for the purpose of aiding and assisting in its work, and, when directed by the President, shall furnish to the commission, on its request, all records—

And so forth; reference being made particularly to the Treasury Department, the Department of Commerce, and the Federal Trade Commission, all great effective offices of the Government, with extensive powers which are subjected to the orders of this absolutely colorless and powerless so-called tariff commission.

One of the interesting features of the bill is the provision on page 96 which provides that witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and that witnesses whose depositions are taken, and the persons taking the same, except employees of the commission, shall be severally entitled to the same fees and mileage as are paid for like service in the courts of the United States. Mr. President, I wonder if the framers of the bill considered the cost to which the Government would be subjected by that provision. Every inquiry that this proposed commission makes will be made upon subpoenas of witnesses at the expense of the Government, to be paid mileage as though they were witnesses in a court—a court which had power to dispose of the matter before it and to enter a final judgment.

The provisions applicable to courts are extended to this commission, which has no power to do anything at all, to make any finding which has any force or effect.

It would be difficult to calculate the expense; but, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] well says, that feature of it probably has never been considered.

I have been very much in favor, Mr. President, of a tariff commission that would relieve the country and the Congress of some of the illogical situations to which they have been subjected heretofore in the ordeal of tariff revision, and would relieve the industry and business of the country of the periodic revolutions of industrial conditions, upheavals, destruction, and loss that come through wholesale revision of the tariff, brought about first by one political party and then by another; but the specious pretext of a tariff commission provided for in this bill could not by any possibility accomplish such a result. Tariffs would be made in the future just as they have been made in the past.

I want to call attention to some expressions of opinion of distinguished men, of various views upon a tariff policy, in regard to those methods and the impressions left upon participants in the process of framing tariff schedules and tariff classifications in Congress.

In 1910 a prominent majority Member of the House committee that framed the bill of 1909, Congressman E. J. HILL, of Connecticut, said:

I hope never to see another general revision of the tariff, with its consequent upheaval of our whole industrial organization, and with the abominable trading and dickering which inevitably result therefrom.

Senator Vest, who had a part in framing the bill of 1894, said:

I look back now upon what occurred during the debate and conference on the Wilson-Gorman bill as a nightmare, from the effects of which I have never recovered.

Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, speaking in 1911, when he was a Member of the House, declared:

The methods by which the tariff has been revised in the past are unscientific, illogical, and out of date. This applies to every tariff that has been enacted.

The chairman of the Senate committee in 1909, Senator Aldrich, stated he was seeing 100 persons a day and working 18 hours out of every 24.

Elihu Root, then Senator from New York and a member of the majority party, said, in the midst of the debates of 1909:

We have been here for over three months considering and discussing and voting upon the measure of protection that it is necessary to give in order to keep alive and prosperous the business of tens of thousands of corporations engaged in the manufacture and trades affected by the protective tariff. Upon one hand we have garbled statements; upon the other equally garbled and partial statements; and no means of distinguishing the truth. We are under the necessity of proceeding by guesswork, by conjecture, always with dissatisfaction, because we recognize the chance that we have guessed wrong about whose statements came nearest to the truth.

There is a growing sentiment throughout the country in favor of taking the tariff, so far as the making of the schedule of rates is concerned, out of politics. Of course, the tariff policy of the country—that is, the question of whether we should establish what has come to be known as a system of protection, by means of taxes levied upon imports—can not be taken out of politics, because it is a matter which ultimately must be determined by the people at large through force of public opinion operating in elections. When the people have expressed their opinion as to the question of this policy the only way in which it can be carried out is through an act of Congress.

Not only must the question of whether or not there shall be a protective tariff or merely a tariff for revenue or no tariff at all, which is free trade, be determined in politics and established by an act of Congress, but upon what rule or basis the rates shall be fixed must also be established by an act of Congress, and, that being the case, must be more or less a question of politics as it will be made an issue in the congressional elections. That much having been determined, however, by the people and by their Representatives in Congress, further dealing with the tariff is largely a question of fact rather than of policy or opinion—that is, it having been determined, we will say, that there should be a protective tariff and that it shall be based upon the difference in the cost of production of manufactures in this country and in foreign countries, the matter of taking up and classifying the many thousand articles, with their various grades and qualities, in the multitudinous lines of industry and production and of determining the cost of each class and grade in the United States and the cost of the same in some foreign country which may compete with the United States is a question of fact. The ascertainment of questions of fact should proceed upon systematic and scientific lines. In fact, it is in itself a scientific question. It is just as unreasonable to undertake to settle such a scientific question—to arrange all these various classifications and gradings and to assemble the mass of minute details necessary to determine these comparative costs in a political campaign, by campaign speeches, political meetings, torchlight processions, and, in the last analysis, by discussions in the committees and upon the floors of Congress—as it would be to undertake to make a chemical analysis of the contents of a glass of water on the hustings or in congressional debate.

And yet, strange to say, though we have been dealing with the question of a tariff for a hundred years or more, we have never yet progressed beyond that crude way of making tariff schedules. Anyone who is interested can turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read the almost maudlin state of mind in which the various branches of Congress become involved by debates and colloquies on the floor as to the scientific elements involved in the items of a tariff schedule. The construction of Congress, with its 531 Members, while it is admirably adapted to carry out the will of a great people, with its multitude of conflicting interests, so far as the establishment of the machinery of government and the principles and rules by which it shall be carried on is concerned, yet in its very nature is wholly unadapted to scientific investigation to be carried out by the body itself in session as a legislature. Ordinarily, if the Congress desires to ascertain a scientific fact, it either constitutes an agency of its own, with powers and instructions to proceed to ascertain the fact and report it to Congress, or else refers the matter to one of the constituted branches of the Government dealing with the particular matters. The question then is taken up by scientists and experts who, through a long course of training, have acquired all existing knowledge of the subject and are provided with all of the means and equipment essential to the investigation, and situated in such a condition of retirement and quiet as facilitates scientific research. In this way the scientific truth is approximated.

Now, some method should be applied to the great work of classifying and grading the myriad of commodities of commerce subject to a tariff and of applying thereto whatever tariff rule may be laid down by Congress. The only way in which this can be done is through an administrative agent of some kind. Some one of the already established bureaus or offices of the Government might be utilized. In view, however, of the magnitude of the work, its importance, its need of continuous attention, and in view of the fact that the present bureaus of the Government are already overloaded with duties, a new and special and independent tribunal with full administrative powers should be established for this purpose. In the last Congress I proposed this in a carefully drawn amendment to the tariff bill. It provided for a commission of five members, the term of office of each member being 15 years, subject to removal at any time by a majority vote of the Congress of the United States, and the salary of each member of the commission to be $12,500 per annum, their terms expiring at intervals of 3 years and the appointments thereto to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This tenure of office and respectable salary were proposed in order to justify men of first-class character and ability accepting the position and to insure work of the highest quality upon this delicate and vital matter. Aside from what has already been stated as to the advantages of this method of ascertaining the requisite tariff facts and putting them into effect, such a system has the following merits: It would very likely permanently settle the tariff question, because, by the operation of this system, the tariff would be gradually and continually adjusted to the constantly changing needs and conditions of business, so that excesses and extravagances of profits on the one hand, or inadequate rates on the other, would not give rise to the protests and discontent which have brought about our great tariff campaigns in the past. Heretofore the schedule of rates was fixed by Congress, was supposed to represent the facts aimed at by the tariff policy which had been established in the country. Of course, this was largely fiction, because it was utterly impossible to arrive at any accurate schedule under the old system; but even supposing that it were entirely accurate, and that the schedule was intended to represent the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, these rates were supposed to be based upon conditions existing only at the time the act was passed. In six months or a year new methods of manufacture, new organizations, new inventions in science and art, new costs of raw materials, new supplies, increased quantity of production, new conditions of transportation of materials entering into the manufacture, and a myriad of other constituent elements may have undergone change, and in some instances revolution, and yet the tariff, in all of its particular rates, based upon an obsolete condition remained in force utterly out of tune and out of harmony with the new conditions. Consequently it not only failed, necessarily, of the purpose for which it was intended when it was supposed to be in accordance with a carefully worked out rule and policy, but very frequently, by reason of these changed conditions, it had the opposite effect. In some instances it became a shelter and shield of monopoly; in other instances it was wholly inadequate as a protection from foreign competition, and worked injustice upon the consuming public in some instances to an extreme degree. Now, this might be the case with some of the items in the schedule, while as to others conditions may not have changed. The rates as to these latter may still be just and in accordance with the rule and policy of the country. In such a situation there is no administrative tribunal to which an aggrieved manufacturer or consumer can apply for relief in a particular case. The old, obsolete schedule in its entirety remains in force, business adjusts itself to these artificial conditions, discontent increases, and in most of our campaigns such conditions have constituted the central political issue. Campaign spellbinders go out before the people with their grist of amusing stories, superficial argument, and sophistry. The business of the country is affected by the doubt and uncertainty as to what the result will be. The country may decree a change and vote for a new tariff policy and the old process of revision of the entire schedule from one end to the other, with possibly the reversal of the whole tariff policy of the country, and the substitution of a new system, or, at least, of a new measure and rule of protection, is decreed. Business is thrown into a condition of panic; widespread disaster, loss, and suffering ensue, and hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars are unnecessarily wasted by throwing suddenly out of gear the entire economic system of the United States. Economically and scientifically, nothing could be more foolish; and very frequently, in a material way, so far as the standards of living, comforts, and necessities of the people are concerned, nothing could be more disastrous.

If a permanent administrative tribunal were established no such disturbance to business would occur—no such alarm and disaster. Every consumer, every manufacturer would be free at any time to call the attention of the commission to any special discrepancy or injustice in existing rates, to any change in costs of manufacture, conditions of business, supply of raw material, or other element entering into the equation. The commission composed of able men, who soon would become scientists in this particular field, with full equipment to deal with the vast multitude of questions involved, would here investigate, ascertain the facts, apply the rule and measure previously laid down by Congress, and if change were necessary, make that change so as to keep alive the policy decreed by the law of the land. They would deal with one complaint at a time. The result would be that the tariff, instead of being a hard and set, unchanging schedule of fixed rates—immutable except by the economic revolution described above—would be constantly and quietly adjusted, gradually fitting itself to the circumstances of the times. In this way only, by making the rates adjustable, would the principle itself be constant. The country as a whole, while receiving the benefit of the system, would be unconscious of the economic operation of its establishment and enforcement.

The unsettled state of our tariff, after a hundred and twenty-five years of discussion, is not due so much to a difference of opinion among our people on the policy of the tariff, although there is difference in that regard, as to the unscientific and impossible system of administering it which we have heretofore followed.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. As I understand the Senator, he is in favor of a tariff commission with power similar to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to adjust rates to a rule laid down by Congress in advance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly; that is my position.

Mr. CLAPP. Has the Senator dealt or does he intend to deal on this occasion with the legal question involved in the matter?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will deal with that in a moment.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator will point out that every legal question which can be raised against such a proposed plan has been permanently accepted by the American people in the administration of railroad rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the maximum and minimum tariff provisions in the tariff law with reference to the tariff.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree entirely with the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator will make that plain. No-body to-day, however, will pay any attention to it. This is the only country on earth that tolerates such an incongruous, absurd, and grotesque system as we have, and it seems destined to tolerate it; but if these facts and truths and principles are enunciated often enough the country may some time wake up to the necessity of having a systematic system, an easily workable plan, with reference to the tariff.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is only for the purpose of agitating the question that I am making these remarks, as the Senator suggested. We ought not to be discouraged, however, at the impossibility of accomplishing this great measure at this time, because our experience has been in the entire development of our Government that it has been by slow degrees.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think we should ever be discouraged. If it took man 6,000 years of fairly authentic history to reach the American Declaration of Independence, we ought never to be discouraged because these things are not reached in our own time and at the present moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is generally assumed that the Republican Party has always been in favor of protection and the Democratic Party always against it. This is not the case at all, however. Both the Democratic and the Republican Parties, time and time again, have declared in favor of a protective tariff, and on many occasions the two great parties have used almost identical language in declaring their policy in this regard, while both have at times been entirely noncommittal on the subject or declared substantially for a revenue tariff.

In 1908 the Republican Party itself revolted from the inequalities and excesses which the flux of business conditions, in contact with its rigid schedules, had produced in the Republican tariff law at that time, although the party still adhered to the policy of protection. In its great convention at Chicago on June 16-20, 1908, it declared:

The true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

In 1888 the Democratic Party in its national platform declared "a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises."

In 1892 the Republican Party declared in almost identical words the same identical tariff rule and policy, as follows:

On all imports coming into competition with the products of American labor there should be levied duties equal to the difference between wages abroad and at home.

In 1872 the Democratic platform held to all intents and purposes that the question of protection or free trade was not a party question, and the Democratic Party practically declined to take a stand upon it, declaring as follows:

Recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their congressional districts and to the decision of the Congress thereon, wholly free from Executive interference or dictation.

In the same year the Republican Party was almost equally noncommittal on the subject, only declaring that revenue duties should "be so adjusted" as to "details as to aid in securing remunerative wages to labor," and so forth.

In 1876 the Democratic Party mistook the unscientific system and method by which a crude tariff bill was enacted for the policy itself, and blamed the policy of protection for what was not at all due to it, but was due to the method of its administration. It declared as follows:

We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly 4,000 articles as a masterpiece of injustice and inequality and false pretense. * * * It has impoverished many industries and subsidized a few.

This must inevitably be the case to a greater or less extent, at an earlier or later date, with every tariff schedule framed on the hustings or by congressional debates, aided, as the latter are under our present system, by the interested testimony of representatives of benefited interests before the tariff committees of Congress. These committees themselves, in the very nature of things, are not informed, in the brief time which they are able to devote to the subject, on all the scientific essentials of the four or five thousand items involved.

In 1876 the Republican national platform declared that:

The revenue necessary for current expenditures and the obligations of a public debt must be largely derived from duties upon importations which, so far as possible, should be adjusted to promote the interests of American labor and advance the prosperity of the whole country.

This is substantially the same as the Democratic declarations of 1884 and 1888.

In 1880 the Republican Party repeated the declaration substantially in favor of a revenue tariff, with incidental protection, that:

The duties levied for the purpose of revenue should so discriminate as to favor American labor.

In 1884 the Democratic platform declared:

The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

This is exactly the same protective doctrine that has been expressed time and time again in the Republican platform.

In the same year, 1884, the Republican Party declared for tariff reform, with a somewhat milder statement in favor of the policy of protection than that contained in the Democratic platform. Its language was as follows:

The Republican Party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus not by the vicious and indiscriminate process of horizontal reduction, but by such methods as will relieve the taxpayer without injuring the laborer or the great productive interests of the country.

In view of this record there ought not to be great political difficulty in arriving at a common agreement on this subject with the support of such a body of public opinion as to no longer make it a debatable party issue. The possibility of doing this, however, depends absolutely upon the establishment of some system by which the policy and the extent of protection shall be fairly, certainly, scientifically, and continuously administered.

This can only be done through the means of a nonpartisan and nonpolitical executive tribunal or official established by Congress as its agent for executing the legislative enactments. The human race will never obtain perfection in the administration of the law under any form of government. All systems depend as much for success upon the merit and character of the administration as upon the principles and theories of the Constitution or law. If, however, we obtain from such a high-class tribunal as is proposed that degree of meritorious service which we would have a right to expect, it is altogether probable that the animosities and political contentions which have stirred the country and demoralized business in presidential campaigns for so many decades will not again recur; for it is entirely obvious, both from the reading of party platforms and from the history of the times, that the great campaigns against existing tariff laws and for wholesale revision had their origin, not so much in a difference of opinion as to the principle of protection of American labor and American industry, as in the gross abuses which arose in the application of that principle. The attack was not so much upon the theory, although that, of course, was involved, as it was upon the percentages and specific figures of the schedules framed upon the advice of their beneficiaries and through the medium of campaign speeches and congressional debates.

In 1876, 1892, and 1904 the Democratic Party declared specifically against protection, although in 1884 and 1888 it declared specifically in favor of protection, and the same measure of protection as that advocated by the Republican Party whenever the party in its national platforms undertook to specify the measure or extent of its application. This was again expressed by the Republican Party very clearly in 1904—

The measure of protection should always, at least, equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

From this record of authoritative declarations of the great political parties of the country on the question of a tariff it can be claimed that, generally speaking, the policy of protection in itself is very well established as a national principle. While the Democratic Party several times has declared against it, it has often declared in favor of it, at other times evading the issue altogether; and at still other times, in platform declarations not necessary to quote, it has contented itself with the denunciation of the abuses and iniquities of particular tariff bills and schedules enacted by the Republican Party without stating its own position upon the principle of customs duties. The Republican Party, on the other hand, while in its earlier career treating the tariff as a negligible question, and by its silence evading altogether the issue of protection—and in 1876 and 1880 favoring a revenue tariff—in all of its later platforms has declared in favor of the protective policy. Sometimes it has contented itself with a mere general declaration in favor of protection to American industry without specifying the measure or rule by which this protection was to be governed; but wherever it has undertaken to specify the extent of protection which should be given to labor and to industry in the tariff schedules it has laid down in almost identical language the same measure which the Democratic Party on several occasions has adopted.

However, a mere board of investigation, such as is provided for in the revenue bill now pending in the Senate, directed only to report its findings to Congress, will be almost entirely useless. Of course, it might be the foundation out of which would be developed by amendments later on, as the need therefor should appear, a real administrative commission, with sufficient powers to make it useful. There have been tariff investigations without number, and they are piled up in dusty racks by the carload. Little, if any, attention is paid to them. The conditions found by such investigations very frequently change before the reports are fully printed. The appointment of investigating commissions is a well-recognized way of defeating measures. They are the cause of interminable delay and very seldom productive of definite results upon questions which have been so sharply debated as the tariff.

There is no question that an administrative commission, with power to ascertain facts under a law of Congress, which would provide that the specific figures found by the commission as the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad should go into effect as a tariff on the respective articles, would be constitutional. The creation of such a commission, with power to ascertain these facts, and a provision that the rates so ascertained by the commission as facts shall be the tariff rate, is not really a fixing of rates by the commission but by Congress. It is to all intents and purposes equivalent to a law enacted by Congress which provides that every article upon which a protective rate is levied under the existing law shall, upon its entry into this country, be subject to a tariff charge equal to the difference which it costs to produce it in this country and that which it costs to produce it in the foreign country whence it was shipped. This is certainly not a delegation of legislative power, but is the fixing of the rates by Congress itself. The ascertainment of the figures complying with the rate provided in the act of Congress involves no more discretion on the part of the proposed tariff commission than does the act of the customs officers under the present law in determining the quality, grade, and kind of goods seeking entry at our ports. It is a mere ascertainment of a fact. Under the present law there are many classifications of cotton and woolen goods, for instance, of various chemical and food products, each subject to a different rate of duty. When goods of this class are offered for entry skilled and expert examination is required to determine which grade, classification, or quality they are. If they belong to one classification, one rate applies; if to another classification or grade, another rate applies. The officials of the customs service examine them and determine what rate each shall be held for. This is not a legislative act on the part of the customs officials, although they fix the rate. It is on their part merely a determination of the fact as to the grade or quality or kind of the commodity imported. So if a tariff commission, with administrative powers as proposed, were created, and goods of these various grades and classifications should be offered for entry at our custom-houses, the same customs officials as now constituted would make the same sort of examination as to grade or quality, and when that question was determined would hold the goods for a rate equal to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, the same having been previously ascertained by the proposed tariff commission.

There can not be any question about the constitutional validity of such an administrative arrangement. The exercise of such powers by administrative officials is similar in principle to the duties of the Forest Service in determining what land within a forest reserve is valuable for agricultural purposes, and hence subject to homestead entry. The allowance of homestead entries on agricultural lands in forest reserves is a legislative act, but it is left for the administrative officials of the Forest Service to determine what lands are and what are not valuable for agriculture. It would be impossible for Congress to do this, just as it is impossible for Congress to keep a constantly adjusted schedule of tariff rates fixed by itself, harmonizing with any scientific principle of tariff protection. Such powers would be similar to those delegated by Congress to the Reclamation Service until the law was recently amended. As the law was originally passed the Reclamation Service, in the administration of the general rules laid down by Congress, selected out of the various possible projects such as it determined came within the rules laid down in the reclamation act. Congress provided for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars on these great reclamation works, but left to its administrative officials not only the expenditure of the money but the selection of the areas upon which it should be expended, governed, of course, by the general rules laid down by Congress, just as it is proposed that the tariff commission shall be governed by such general rules.

So Congress delegated to the President of the United States, as its administrative agent, the power of determining the extent of Government railroads which should be built in Alaska and also their location. The law fixed certain limitations and conditions; but as Congress was of the opinion that efficiency and wisdom in the location and construction of these roads would be facilitated by leaving the choice of route and the amount of mileage in the determination of an administrative officer, it lodged these powers in the President.

So as to the administration of the permanent civil service of the Government. It is entirely a legislative matter. Congress, however, does not undertake to examine each applicant for employment in the civil service, or even to specify what conditions shall be attached to his employment, except the general condition that his service shall be upon an examination and his tenure of office shall be subject only to his efficiency and good behavior and shall be free from political control. It appoints the Civil Service Commission to fix the conditions and terms of examinations and of employment for the carrying out of the general rule laid down by Congress. Of a similar sort are the administrative powers exercised by the Postmaster General, under a law recently passed, by which he may fix the weight of parcel-post packages and the parcel-post rates thereon. This is a very wise proviso, giving life and elasticity to the parcel-post law. It is true that it is a legislative matter and it is legislated upon in Congress by laying down general rules and limitations giving the Postmaster General discretion to carry out these rules in the manner indicated. He does this as the agent of Congress, subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This latter commission also is another illustration of the delegation of administrative duties by Congress in the carrying out of its legislative acts, as the Interstate Commerce Commission, authorized by Congress to fix railroad rates and to regulate railroad service, has various ways of determining, in its discretion and judgment, within the rule laid down by Congress, what the service and rates shall be. This is very similar to the proposed powers for an administrative tariff commission authorized to ascertain certain facts, which facts shall by act of Congress become the rate of tariff; except that the Interstate Commerce Commission, authorized to fix reasonable rates and reasonable service, has much greater latitude of power and far more discretion than such a tariff commission would have operating under the rule proposed.

So as to the Bureau of Fisheries of the United States. It is established by act of Congress. It carries on a vast work and expends many millions of dollars in distributing in the ocean and inland waters of the United States various species of food fishes. Congress has laid down certain broad and general lines for its guidance and government, but the Bureau of Fisheries, in administering this law, selects the species of fish, the stream in which it shall be placed, the manner in which the same shall be propagated, without referring the specific details to Congress. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as one will note from daily observation and from public signs in various places, establish certain rules and regulations which have the effect of law in the District. All of this, of course, is in pursuance of legislative power. The legislative power has been exercised by Congress in creating and providing for these commissioners and directing them to administer the powers of Congress in this regard. So it may be said of all the officials in the entire government of the District. They are all the delegated agents of Congress, carrying out in an administrative way the powers which are vested in the Congress of the United States "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District."

The same delegation of administrative duties under legislative power is observed in various officials in the government of the Territories and island possessions of the United States, which Congress has so provided under its power "to dispose of and make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," but which powers are necessarily carried out through its administrative agents.

Such illustrations could be multiplied indefinitely, where Congress lays down general rules and establishes departments, bureaus, commissions, secretaries, and other agencies authorized to ascertain facts and conditions and to apply the rules or statutes of Congress to them. Most conspicuous and conclusive of all, perhaps, is the power over the tariff itself, vested in the President as the agent and executive of Congress, in the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, authorizing him, upon the ascertainment of certain facts—relating to discrimination against us in the tariff laws of other countries—to change every rate in the entire act and to substitute an entirely different schedule for it under a rule laid down by Congress. No one has ever questioned the constitutionality of this delegated administrative power. It is not different in principle from the powers proposed for a tariff commission.

Other enlightened nations vest in their executives such powers over the tariff as enable them to make the law an intelligent instrument for serving the needs of industry, as events and emergencies arise—changing conditions, domestic, foreign, or international.

After enumerating the various specific powers of Congress, the Constitution vests Congress with this general power:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, etc.

The executive and administrative agents, which in a multitude of matters Congress has established with more or less elaborate detail and more or less extensive authority, and which, in fact, constitute the greater part of the enormous roster of Government employees, high and low, are all created in pursuance of the general power vested in Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the specific powers granted in the Constitution.

The establishment of a tariff commission with administrative powers such as I have suggested would be but adding another one to those agencies.

This method of applying and carrying into effect the policy of the country as to the tariff, as established by Congress, has been held valid by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Field against Clark (143 U. S., 649). It was argued by importers that the power vested by Congress in section 3 of the act of October 1, 1890, in the President if he should "be satisfied" that the tariff laws of any foreign country, with reference to the importation into those countries of the products of the United States, imposed duties or other exactions upon such products of the United States which—he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend by proclamation to that effect the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, etc.

And that during such suspension duties, as set forth in the act, should be levied upon sugar, and so forth, imported from such foreign countries into the United States.

It was claimed that this was unconstitutional as a delegation to an executive officer of legislative powers.

In deciding this contention, Mr. Justice Harlan, for the court, said:

The authority given to the President by the act of June 4, 1794, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require," and under regulations, to be continued or revoked "whenever he shall think proper"; by act of February 9, 1799, to remit and discontinue for the time being the restraints and prohibitions which Congress had prescribed with respect to commercial intercourse with the French Republic "if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States," and "to revoke such order whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require"; by the act of December 19, 1806, to suspend for a named time the operation of the nonimportation act of the same year "if, in his judgment, the public interest should require it"; by the act of May 1, 1810, to revive a former act, as to Great Britain or France, if either country had not by a named day so revoked or modified its edicts as not "to violate the neutral commerce of the United States"; by the acts of March 3, 1815, and May 31, 1830, to declare the repeal, as to any foreign nation, of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States when he should be "satisfied" that the discriminating duties of such foreign nations, "so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States," had been abolished; by the act of March 6, 1866, to declare the provisions of the act forbidding the importation into this country of neat cattle and the hides of neat cattle to be inoperative "whenever, in his judgment," their importation "may be made without danger of the introduction or spread of contagious or infectious disease among the cattle of the United States;" must be regarded as unwarranted by the Constitution, if the contention of the appellants, in respect to the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, be sustained.

That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed, that is, which he found to be, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed, in advance, the duties to be levied, collected, and paid, on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President. The words, "he may deem," in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable or the contrary in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension, as to that country, which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it can not be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provision, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

"The true distinction," as Judge Ranney, speaking for the Supreme Court of Ohio, has well said, "is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law." The first can not be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made." Cincinnati, Wilmington, etc., Railroad v. Commissioners (1 Ohio St., 88). In Moers v. City of Reading (21 Penn. St., 188, 202), the language of the court was: "Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons as to its execution, the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it can not be said that the exercise of such discretion is the making of the law." So, in Locke's Appeal (72 Penn. St., 491, 498): "To assert that a law is less than a law, because it is made to depend on a future event or act, is to rob the legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed or to things future and impossible to fully know." The proper distinction the court said was this: "The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the law-making power and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation."

In Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470) a similar question was decided as to a provision in the act of Congress of March 2, 1897:

Section 2 provides for the appointment by the Secretary of the Treasury, immediately after the passage of the act, and on or before February 15 of each subsequent year, of a board of tea experts, "who shall prepare and submit to him standard samples of tea." Section 3 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of said board, "shall fix and establish uniform standards of purity, quality, and fitness for consumption of all kinds of teas imported into the United States."

The court said (p. 496):

The claim that the statute commits to the arbitrary discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury the determination of what teas may be imported, and therefore in effect vests that official with legislative power, is without merit. We are of the opinion that the statute, when properly construed, as said by the Circuit of Appeals, but expresses the purpose to exclude the lowest grades of tea, whether demonstrably of inferior purity or unfit for consumption, or presumably so because of their inferior quality. This, in effect, was the fixing of a primary standard and devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury the mere executive duty to effectuate the legislative policy declared in the statute. The case is within the principle of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649)—

That is the case I just cited—

where it was decided that the third section of the tariff act of October 3, 1890, was not repugnant to the Constitution as conferring legislative and treaty-making power on the President, because it authorized him to suspend the provisions of the act relating to the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides. We may say of the legislation in this case, as was said of the legislation considered in Field v. Clark, that it does not, in any real sense, invest administrative officials with the power of legislation. Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would, in effect, amount but to declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

I may say here, Mr. President, that so far as this question of the delegation of legislative power is concerned, whatever powers could be delegated to the President could, of course, be delegated to a tariff commission. Both of these cases which I have just cited are leading cases, and have been followed by many subsequent decisions.

Mr. President, I may say, in conclusion, that we will never escape the periodic upheavals of our economic and industrial systems which we have so often suffered from by reason of wholesale political tariff revisions, or be able to economically compete with foreign countries in the struggle for the valuable trade of the world, until we also call to the aid of the legislative branch of the Government a great and permanent administrative tribunal to give accurate and scientific effect to the living principle of the tariff policy which Congress shall adopt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in the few remarks I made I stated that the department had recommended the legislation placed in the bill by the House which was stricken out by the Senate. Since then I have had time to send for a document which was sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the District Commissioners, in which they recommend the legislation adopted by the House. The Senate has stricken that out. I think I ought to read what the commissioners say:

The Public Utilities Commission, by an order dated December 9, 1914, directed the Washington Railway & Electric Co. to construct and operate, on or before June 30, 1915, a double-track extension of its line from Fourteenth and F Streets NW. along Fourteenth Street to Pennsylvania Avenue. The present width of the roadway of Fourteenth Street between Pennsylvania Avenue and F Street is 46 feet, while the roadway to the north and south of this block is 70 feet in width. In order to permit the railway construction in the street and to provide for the demands of vehicular traffic, the roadway should be widened to 70 feet by moving back the existing curb, and at the same time the present granite-block roadway should be replaced by a smoother pavement. The estimated cost of the work, exclusive of that to be done by the railway company, is $7,000, and is a proper charge against the current appropriation for "Repairs to streets, avenues, and alleys." Under the provision of the above item the railway company will pay the cost of the paving between its rails and tracks and 2 feet outside thereof, being a strip in the center of the roadway 20 feet in width. The balance of the paving will be done from the appropriation, and one-half of the cost thereof, to the extent of 40 feet, will be, under the terms of the Borland amendment, assessed against abutting property on both sides of the street.

The legislation contained in said estimate is necessary in order to give the commissioners authority to change the width of the street, and also to authorize the replacement of the granite-block pavement by a smoother pavement.

This is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and indorsed by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Col. Kutz, the Engineer commissioner, came before the Senate committee and asked for the legislation that was placed in the bill by the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber, and I should like to have the question stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole striking out lines 18, 19, and 20 on page 28, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Repave with asphalt the roadway of Fourteenth Street NW., from Pennsylvania Avenue to F Street, 70 feet wide, $7,500.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We are voting on that proposition?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the proposition to strike it out. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. In the Committee of the Whole this item was stricken out. The question now is whether the Senate will concur in that amendment. Those who want it to go out will vote "yea," and those who want it to stay in will vote "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. Beginning on page 119, following the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I offer the following amendment. I suppose it ought to be another section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 119, after line 22, and following the amendment already agreed to at that place, insert:

That from and after October 1, 1916, the Georgetown Gas Light Co. shall not be permitted to charge or collect more than 85 cents per thousand cubic feet for gas for cooking, illuminating, or other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has already agreed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska limiting the charge for gas in the District furnished by the Washington Gas Light Co. to 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet. I asked the Senator from Nebraska if he would not include in that amendment the Georgetown Gas Light Co., and he rightfully stated, I believe, that conditions are somewhat different with the Georgetown Gas Light Co. than with the Washington Gas Light Co. I think there is perhaps a difference, and that gas can not be produced as cheaply in the small plant in Georgetown as in the large plant in the city of Washington. Therefore, I have proposed to make the price 85 cents instead of 75 cents.

To-day the charge by the Georgetown Gas Light Co. is $1 net per thousand feet of gas. I think the charge is $1.15, but if paid before the tenth of the month there is a reduction making it net $1 per thousand feet of gas. There has always been a discrimination between the price charged for gas by the Washington Gas Light Co. and the Georgetown Gas Light Co. In the past it has been 15 cents. My amendment now allows a difference of 10 cents. I thought I would offer an amendment making it exactly the same as that charged by the Washington Gas Light Co., but—

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator know the amount of gas manufactured and sold by the Georgetown Company?

Mr. SMOOT. I was told that there are about 1,000,000 feet of gas produced in Georgetown daily, as against about five or six million in the Washington Gas Light Co.'s plant. In other words, the Washington Gas Light Co. produces between five and six times the amount of gas each day that is produced by the Georgetown Gas Light Co.

Mr. President, I believe that there should be perhaps this difference of 10 cents, and I offer the amendment believing that it is just to the people who live west of Rock Creek. I can not see why there should be any greater difference than 10 cents per thousand feet.

Another thing, I understand that the Washington Gas Light Co. own the controlling interest in the Georgetown Gas Light Co. They have fixed the rate in the District at 85 cents a thousand feet. Therefore I feel that it is nothing more than right that as they control that company they should charge not more than 85 cents, the price that they established themselves.

That is all I want to say in relation to the amendment, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I shall only reiterate what I have previously stated. I do not think that Congress should be expected to fix prices for the products of public utilities. I think, inasmuch as there is a Public Utilities Commission, and as I stated yesterday this Public Utilities Commission has been investigating these matters and are now in a position to determine what is right, that that is the body to determine the prices of these products. If they are not the proper parties to do it, then the Public Utilities Commission should be done away with. But in this matter I shall make no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 122, add, after line 16, new sections, as follows:

SEC. —. That from and after the passage of this act the fund designated by law as the "firemen's relief fund" shall consist of all fines imposed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon members of the fire department by way of discipline, all rewards, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be received by any member of said department for extraordinary services, except such as may be allowed to be retained by such members on the approval of the said commissioners; a deduction of 1½ per cent of the monthly salary of each member of the fire department; and any donations by citizens; all of which shall be collected by the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia and be by him deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the firemen's relief fund and be held subject to the drafts of the commissioners of said District for the purposes hereinafter set forth. The expenditures from said fund shall be made according to law and be accounted for in the manner provided by law: Provided, That should the firemen's relief fund at any time be insufficient to defray the expenditures hereinafter provided for, then the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized, and they shall direct the collector of taxes of said District to deposit, and said collector shall thereupon deposit, in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of said fund, out of receipts from all revenues of the District of Columbia, other than liquor licenses, a sufficient amount to meet any deficiency in the said fund.

SEC. —. That whenever any member of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall become disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty to such an extent as to require medical or surgical services other than such as can be rendered by the board of police and fire surgeons of the said District, or to require hospital treatment, the expenses of such medical or surgical services, or hospital treatment, shall be paid from the firemen's relief fund: Provided, That no such expenses shall be paid except upon certification by the board of police and fire surgeons setting forth the necessity for such services or treatment and the nature of the injury or disease which rendered the same necessary, and approval by the chief engineer of the fire department.

SEC. —. That whenever any member of the fire department shall become so permanently disabled through injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty, or having served not less than 15 years, shall, for any cause, become so permanently disabled as to be retired from the service thereof, he shall receive relief from the firemen's relief fund in the amounts as follows: Chief engineer, $150 per month; deputy chief engineer, $125 per month; battalion chief engineers, fire marshals, and superintendents of machinery, $100 per month; deputy fire marshals and captains, $90 per month; lieutenants and assistant superintendents of machinery, $75 per month; engineers and drivers, $60 per month; assistant engineers and assistant drivers, $55 per month; inspectors, privates, and all other members, $50 per month. In case of the death of any member of the fire department of the District of Columbia before or after retirement from the service thereof from injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under 16 years of age, or a dependent father or mother, or both, the same shall be entitled to relief from the firemen's relief fund as follows: A widow, dependent father, or dependent mother, $35 per month, and each child under the age of 16 years, $10 per month: Provided, That upon the remarriage of any widow granted relief under the provisions of this act such relief shall cease, and that relief to or for any child or children under the age of 16 years shall cease upon their reaching the age of 16 years; and that no widow, child, or children of any deceased retired member of the fire department resulting from any marriage contracted subsequent to the date of retirement of such member shall be entitled to any of the relief herein set forth.

SEC. —. That any member of the fire department who shall have served in said department for a period of 25 years and attained the age of 50 years shall be entitled, upon written application therefor, to be retired from the service of such department and receive relief from the firemen's relief fund in the amount provided in section 3 of this act: Provided, That any member of the fire department who shall have served therein for a period of 25 years and attained the age of 60 years shall be compulsorily retired from the service of such department and granted relief from the firemen's relief fund in the amount provided in section 3 of this act.

SEC. —. That the sum of $100 shall be allotted from the firemen's relief fund to defray the funeral expenses of any deceased member of the fire department or any deceased retired member thereof.

SEC. —. That a retiring board, to be composed of the chief engineer of the fire department and two other officers and two privates of the said department, to be appointed by the Commissioners of said District, shall consider all cases for the retirement and relief of members of the fire department rendered necessary or expedient under the provisions of this act, and all applications for the relief of widows or children under 16 years of age and dependent fathers or mothers; and in all cases of the retirement of members of the fire department the board of police and fire surgeons shall certify, in writing, to the retiring board the physical condition of the member for whom such retirement and relief is sought. The said retiring board shall give notice to every member under consideration for retirement and relief to appear before the board and give such evidence as he may desire, and the proceedings of the said board shall be reduced to writing and shall show the date of the appointment of the member under consideration, his age, his record in the service, and any other information that may be pertinent to the matter of his retirement and relief. The retiring board shall submit a report of its findings to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall, in all cases where retirement and relief are sought by reason of the length of service and attainment of the age hereinbefore set forth, direct that the member be retired and granted relief in the amount provided in section 3: Provided, That in cases other than those seeking retirement and relief by reason of the length of service and the attainment of the age hereinbefore specified, the commissioners shall have the power to take further testimony if they so desire to determine the physical condition of the member under consideration, and shall, when in their opinion such physical condition warrants such action, authorize and direct the retirement of the member and his relief in the amount provided in section 3.

SEC. — That whenever relief is granted under the provisions of this act the same shall be permanent and not subject to discontinuance or reduction: Provided, however, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may discontinue the relief granted to any person under the provisions of this act upon receipt of duly certified information from a court of record that any person receiving such relief has been convicted in such court of any crime involving moral turpitude, or whenever any such person shall be found by the retiring board, after notice and trial, to be a habitual drunkard or guilty of lewd or lascivious conduct.

SEC. — That any retired member of the fire department receiving relief under the provisions of this act may, in time of flood, riot, conflagration, during extraordinary assemblages, or unusual emergencies, be called by the chief engineer of the fire department into the service of such department for such duties as his disability will permit of his performing, without compensation therefor: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to enforce residence in the District of Columbia upon any retired member of the fire department when residence elsewhere is rendered necessary by his physical condition.

SEC. — That wherever in this act the words "in the line of duty" are used they shall be construed to apply to the members of the fire department at all times when within the District of Columbia: Provided, That any member of the fire department shall be entitled to the relief provided for in this act for any disability incurred outside the District of Columbia when ordered to such place by his superior officers, in the same manner as if incurred within the said District.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, on the part of the committee I shall make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with this amendment, in order that the information which the document contains may be accessible to the conferees, a letter from the Commissioners of the District in support of the amendment which I have offered. The letter is not addressed to me. It is a copy of a letter which is addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, House of Representatives. I shall ask to have it printed without reading. I will not detain the Senate to read it. I invite the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the communication.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Washington, April 4, 1916.

Hon. BEN JOHNSON,
Chairman of Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on H. R. 12427, entitled "A bill to provide for the creation of a policemen and firemen's relief fund for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," which was referred to them by you for examination and report.

The commissioners also have before them, by reference from you, the three following bills dealing with the subject of policemen and firemen's pensions, namely:

H. R. 433, entitled "A bill for the creation of the firemen's relief fund of the District of Columbia, to provide relief for members of the fire department, and for other purposes";

H. R. 6894, entitled "A bill to create the Metropolitan police retiring fund"; and

H. R. 8660, entitled "A bill to provide for the creation of a police and firemen's relief fund of the District of Columbia, to provide for the relief and retirement of members of the police and fire departments of said District, to establish a method of procedure for such relief and retirement, and for other purposes."

The commissioners have given careful consideration to these several measures, and they believe that any action to be taken by Congress on the subject matter of pensions for police and firemen of the District of Columbia should be based on H. R. 12427. In the judgment of the commissioners this bill best presents the question for purposes of regulation and control by the executive authority of the municipality, and at the same time conserves the real equities of the members of the police and fire departments and of the District of Columbia. The bill H. R. 12427 is practically in its entirety a combination of the best features contained in H. R. 433 and H. R. 8660. This report will therefore deal solely with H. R. 12427.

It is proposed by section 1 of the bill to provide for a joint relief fund for both the police and fire departments rather than having a separate fund for each department, as is the case under existing law. The commissioners can see no good reason for continuing the present practice of separate relief funds, one for the police department and one for the fire department. They believe a joint fund with uniform provisions of law applying alike to each department to be administratively wise and conducive to the best interests of the service of both departments.

By section 2 of the bill it is proposed to treat as revenue of the joint fund certain classes of moneys which under present law are used for pension payments. In lieu of a flat deduction of $1 a month from the salary of each officer and member of the two departments it is proposed to deduct 1½ per cent of the monthly salaries of such officers and members. Police-court fines and money derived from the tax on dogs, now credited to the two pension funds, will not be so used under the terms of this bill, but will be covered into the Treasury as general revenue for appropriation purposes. The principal feature of this section relates to the source from which moneys shall be obtained for the purpose of supplying deficiencies in the joint fund. The law at this time permits the use of police-court fines and dog taxes to meet deficiencies in pension payments, but the moneys derived in this manner are entirely inadequate, as is evidenced by the fact that since 1911 there has accumulated in the police-pension fund a deficiency of $45,480.05 and in the firemen's relief fund $22,930.82, or an aggregate deficiency for both funds of $68,410.87. Because of the insufficient revenue for pension payments it has been necessary from time to time during the period from 1911 to date to prorrate pension payments.

It is therefore essentially necessary, if an adequate pension fund is to be created, to provide a source from which sufficient moneys may be obtained to meet deficiencies and to pay pensions or relief allowances in full. It is proposed by this bill that such amounts shall be obtained wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia, the collector of taxes covering into the Treasury to the credit of the joint fund, from time to time as may be required, revenues of the District collected by him.

Section 3 of the bill is substantially existing law and needs no discussion.

Section 4 contemplates material changes in existing law. The retirement of a member of either department for permanent disability incurred in the line of duty is now authorized by law. The provision for retirement after 25 years of service for permanent disability from any cause, and the provision for retirement on attaining the age of 60 years in the discretion of the commissioners, contemplates new legislation. These new features are believed to be essential to the system and will operate to maintain high physical standards in the two departments and will insure a much greater efficiency in both services than is now possible.

It is proposed by this section to fix a maximum allowance at retirement of one-half of the salary received by an officer or member of either department at the time of retirement. Under present law the following maximum pension allowances are authorized: All officers of or above the rank of captain in the fire department and all officers of and above the rank of lieutenant in the police department, $100 a month; privates in both departments, $50 a month; widows, $50 a month; children under 16 years of age, $25 a month; and family allowance, $50.

The maximum relief allowance for a widow is reduced from $50 to $35 a month; and for children under 16 years of age from $25 to $10 a month. The maximum family allowance of $50 a month remains the same. The provision for relief allowances to dependent fathers and mothers contained in existing law is eliminated from the proposed legislation.

The provision relating to the remarriage of widows and the attainment by children of the age of 16 years is present law; and that with respect to children of a marriage contracted subsequent to the date of retirement of a member is now legislation.

Section 5 of the bill authorizes the payment of an allowance for funeral expenses of not exceeding $75 in any one case. The only change from present law in this respect is to permit such an allowance to be paid to the widow or representative of a deceased retired member of either department. The law now limits the payment of an allowance of this character to the case of the death of a member of the police or fire department occurring while the member was in actual service.

It is proposed by section 6 of the bill to create a retiring and relief board, to be composed of one member from each the police and fire departments and the corporation counsel or one of his assistants, the commissioners being empowered to make and enforce regulations and rules from time to time for the conduct of the board. The police department and the fire department has now each its own retiring board, consisting in each case of members of the respective departments. The commissioners are convinced, as the result of careful consideration of the subject, that the existing practice in this respect is susceptible of improvement and believe that this is accomplished by the action proposed in this section.

Section 7 gives the commissioners the right to require retired members of the police and fire departments, except those who have served 25 years or more, to undergo medical examinations, as the result of which they may determine whether the relief then being paid should be continued, increased, decreased, or discontinued. The present law provides for such examinations every two years.

Section 8 is entirely new legislation, and, in the opinion of the commissioners, it should, or a section substantially similar, be made a part of any legislation passed in the matter of relief allowances to policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia.

Section 9 is new legislation, and the commissioners believe it advisable to have authority to the effect contained therein in any pension legislation passed by Congress.

It appears from a compilation prepared by the Federal Commissioner of Labor, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate in 1910, on the subject of pension funds for municipal employees in the United States, that in 167 municipalities there is, in some form or other, provision for pensioning policemen and firemen. In one-third of this number the entire amount required for the payment of pensions is furnished by the municipality, while two-thirds are supported in part by the municipality and in part by contributions from the employees. In about 40 per cent of the conditions under which pensions are paid to policemen and firemen the sole requisite is permanent disability incurred in the performance of duty; in the remaining 60 per cent a specified length of service, usually about 20 years, is required, coupled in one-third with permanent disability, and another third with the age 50, 55, 60, or 65 years.

The commissioners transmit herewith statements showing the names of the several pensioners in the fire department, the date pensioned, the period of service at the date of retirement, relief allowance authorized, present age of the beneficiary and address, and the cause of death or disability, and a statement containing similar information with respect to pensioners in the police department; also statements prepared by the auditor of the District, presenting information with reference to the deficiencies in the police fund and the firemen's relief fund; information showing by months during the calendar year ended December 31, 1915, the total revenues and pension obligations and percentage of pensions paid each month; information showing the total amount of pensions paid each year during the last 10 years under present pension laws; the total number of pensioners on the rolls each year during the last 10 years; the total number of members of the police and fire departments in active service each year during the last 10 years; and information showing the proportion in terms of percentage of total pensions paid to total salaries paid during each year of the last 10 years.

The commissioners believe that the present pension system for the officers and members of the police and fire departments is inadequate and ineffective to carry out the purposes for which it was created, and that the results are injurious to the morale and efficiency of the two departments mentioned, besides at times inflicting injustice and hardship upon the beneficiaries. The commissioners therefore strongly urge and recommend the enactment of H. R. 12427 into law.

Very respectfully,

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By O. P. NEWMAN, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 7, on page 73, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1917, all special policemen at street railway crossings and intersections in the District of Columbia appointed pursuant to the provisions of an act approved June 24, 1898 (30 Stat. L., ch. No. 496, p. 488), and all acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, are hereby made members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, and as members thereof shall enjoy all the rights, benefits, privileges, and immunities to which they are now entitled or to which they may hereafter become entitled. Said special policemen shall likewise be subject to the same rules and regulations and be paid in the same way and out of the same funds as other members of said Metropolitan police force; Provided, That said special policemen and the regular members of said special police force shall, according to the period of service and classification, be placed upon the same footing and shall perform whatever service may be assigned to them by the superintendent of police; Provided further, That in the making of assignments for duty of special policemen in the Metropolitan police force they shall be given credit for the time they have served in their present positions in the same manner and to the same extent as is now or may hereafter be given to the other members of said police force.

That all laws to the extent that they are in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, the committee makes no objection to that amendment.

Mr. STERLING. In connection with the amendment offered, I will simply call attention to the fact that the amendment is very much the same as House bill 11241, which is recommended by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and is exactly the same as House bill 14670, which has been favorably reported to the House by the House District Committee. I should like to have printed in the RECORD a letter of the Commissioners of the District relative to House bill 11241.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 29, 1916.

HON. BEN JOHNSON,
Chairman of Committee on the District of Columbia.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to recommend favorable action on H. R. 11241, entitled "A bill providing that street railway crossing policemen shall be made members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia," which was referred to them at your instance for examination and report.

The bill, in the opinion of the commissioners, provides in a satisfactory manner for the amalgamation of the street-crossing police force with the Metropolitan police force, an eventuality that would be advisable and desirable and in the best interests of the public service.

Very respectfully,

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By LOUIS BROWNLOW, Acting President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on that amendment, it is proper that some one should say that these street-crossing policemen are now paid by the railroad companies, while, if this amendment is agreed to, they will be paid by the Government and the District of Columbia. If that is thought desirable, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to understand whether that is exactly the case; whether it is the intention of the Senator from South Dakota that these policemen shall hereafter be paid by the Government, and not by the railroad companies?

Mr. STERLING. That is the intention of the amendment. The amendment provides that they shall be paid by the Government, rather than by the railroad companies. I call the attention of the Senator to the statute referred to in the amendment and referred to in the two House bills. The statute is chapter 496, volume 30, Statutes at Large, and the title of the act is "An act to define the rights of purchasers of the Belt Railway, and for other purposes." Section 3 of that act, which is the only section of the act relevant to this question, is as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and required to station special policemen at such street railway crossings and intersections in the city of Washington as the said Commissioners may deem necessary, the expense of such service to be paid pro rata by the respective companies.

Mr. JONES. It is the idea of the Senator from South Dakota to relieve the railroad companies from paying these policemen?

Mr. STERLING. The amendment will relieve them from paying these policemen. I do not know that eventually they will be relieved or rather that they should be relieved from contributing an amount in the way of taxes or otherwise, which would be sufficient to pay the policemen detailed for this service.

Mr. JONES. But if the amendment of the Senator is adopted, that would be the effect of it?

Mr. STERLING. That would be the effect of it. These policemen are to be paid in the same way as are the other policemen, according to the terms of this amendment, and out of the same funds.

Now, just this one word in regard to the amendment. I agree with the principle involved in the amendment. I do not believe that these special policemen should receive their authority from one source—that of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia—and their pay from another, a private source. I do not believe it is good policy; but I believe that they should be employed by and paid by one and the same authority.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that these policemen are stationed at places where the traffic is heavy, and generally at the request of the railroad companies; that their employment tends to facilitate the traffic and to prevent accidents, and that it has been the custom all along that the railroads, which derive great benefit in those two respects—first, the facilitation of traffic; and, second, in relieving themselves of accidents, for which they would have to pay—have been paying for these policemen, and have been glad to pay for them? What reason is there that that expense should now be shifted back onto the taxpayers? I can not see any.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the adoption of the amendment would probably call for other and subsequent legislation, whereby the street railways would be required to pay taxes sufficient to pay the policemen detailed for this special service. It is the principle involved in the present system, however, to which I object.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the Senator from South Dakota think that it would be better for us to get the taxes to which he refers from the railroad companies before we relieve them of the expense to which they are now put? After we have done that, then we can relieve them. Let us not relieve them of that expense and then take chances on finally placing upon them the tax which the Senator from South Dakota thinks they ought to bear.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I feel it is my duty to say to the Senator from South Dakota that, while I have made no objection to this amendment on the floor of the Senate, yet it is a matter to which we shall give very serious consideration when we come to consider the proposed legislation as to the police force which is employed by the railroads for the benefit of the railroads and as to whether or not the Government shall pay for such force, and thereby relieve the railroad companies from making the payment for which they are now held.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] spoke to me with reference to this proposition a short time ago. I did not understand that the effect of his amendment would be to relieve the railroad companies from the payment of the salaries of these policemen. I thought his amendment was intended to make them a part of the police force, to recognize them as regular policemen. However, I am not going to raise the point of order against his amendment, but in this connection I desire to say that a short time ago I received a letter from one of my constituents sending a clipping from a newspaper, charging that the various departments of the Government had in their employ various officials at nominal salaries, their real salaries being paid by some one else, and a very severe criticism was made of that policy. The idea seemed to be that a great many employees in the different departments of the Government were on the rolls in this way, being paid simply nominal salaries, their full salaries being paid by somebody else. I wrote to every departmental head asking for a list of any such employees. I have here letters from the departments, with a statement with reference to the matter, and I think, in justice to the administration and in the interests of a correct statement with reference to the subject, that these letters ought to be printed in the RECORD, and I ask permission to have that done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.
The letters referred to are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1916.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of June 17, making inquiry as to whether this department carries on its rolls of officials or employees any persons at a nominal salary paid by the Government whose actual salary is paid by some one else, reached me promptly. Since its receipt I have had a careful investigation made of our entire list of officials and employees, and am now prepared to state that no official or employee carried on the rolls of this department is paid a nominal salary by the Government and receives an actual salary paid by some one else.

In connection with certain land and oil litigation it has been found to the interests of the Government to commission as special assistant United States attorneys, without compensation in addition to that received by them as employees of some other department, experts of other departments (representatives of the Indian Office, General Land Office, Reclamation Service, etc.). These designations have been made to facilitate Government litigation.

There is an attorney employed on Pacific railroad work in California who is detailed from, and his salary is paid by, the Interior Department. His expenses are paid by the Department of Justice.

As you are probably aware, it has always been the practice of the Department of Justice to allow United States attorneys and their assistants to engage, to a limited extent, in private practice, provided such practice did not interfere in any way with the proper discharge of the duties of their offices. It has also been the practice of the department to permit United States marshals and their deputies to give some attention to private business, provided it did not in any way interfere with the proper discharge of their public duties.

Very truly, yours,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, July 12, 1916.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR JONES: Reference is made to your letter of June 17 and the Secretary's reply of June 19 regarding persons carried on the department's rolls at a nominal salary whose actual salary is paid by some one else. I take pleasure in inclosing herewith a statement giving the information you desire.

Very truly, yours,

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I thought the point of order had already been made against the amendment, and that the point of order was being discussed. It seems, however, from the statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the point of order has not been so made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the point of order is made that the amendment is general legislation, the Chair will sustain it.

Mr. JAMES. I make that point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the bill is disposed of I want to call attention to the proceedings of yesterday as they appear in the RECORD of this morning. During the time the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was on the floor discussing his amendment, speaking of the Washington Gas Light Co., he called the attention of the Senate to this fact. I read from page 11973 of the RECORD:

For the year 1906 they paid a dividend of 10 per cent and set aside a surplus of $170,879.83. They did another thing that year that is peculiar. They had a capital stock at that time of $2,600,000. That is what the capital stock is now. That year, in addition to giving the 10 per cent and the setting aside of this surplus and a large sum for depreciation, taking their own figures, they issued "dividend certificates of indebtedness" to the stockholders for $2,600,000. That was the amount of the capital stock. They gave that to the stockholders without any consideration whatever.

I will not read further than that, for that presented the point upon which I interrogated the Senator. It is not necessary for me to read more than the following:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can it be possible that attention of Congress was ever called to this extraordinary performance?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this is the second time that I have called the attention of Congress to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And on the former occasion, when it was spread upon the records of the Senate here, was no action taken to reduce the rate for gas to the general consuming public?

Mr. NORRIS. On the former occasion when this matter was brought up the amendment which was offered reducing the rate to all the consumers of the product of the Washington Gas Light Co. to 75 cents per thousand feet went out on a point of order. Then an amendment was offered and adopted putting a limitation on the appropriation. That was the result of that discussion, and the measure then passed has been the law ever since. That is what the committee now seeks by their amendment to strike out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, the Senator, as a result of the exposure which he made at that time, succeeded in getting a reduction of gas rates to the Government as a consumer in a limited way? Is that what I understand?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is practically what happened.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A reduction in the rate to the District of Columbia?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is practically what happened.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Senator was not able, because some one on the floor made a point of order against his amendment, to extend that saving to the general consuming public?

Mr. NORRIS. The point of order was made against the amendment, and it went out on that ground.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Senator had informed the Senate of this doubling of the capitalization under the guise of certificates of indebtedness at that time?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, and that has never been denied.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is most remarkable.

I was called into the Marble Room by a visitor almost immediately after that colloquy with the Senator from Nebraska, and while I was off the floor of the Senate the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] interrogated the Senator from Nebraska as follows—I read from page 11974:

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Nebraska excuse an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator again state in what year those certificates were issued?

Mr. NORRIS. They were issued in 1906.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was a Member of the Senate at that time. He seems to be horrified, but he was then here.

Again, the Senator from New Hampshire referred to me in that connection on the next page, about the center of the second column, from which I read as follows:

Mr. NORRIS. I said that the Senator admitted that he had done his duty, and the Senator then replied that he did not admit it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well that is better, if the Senator puts it that way; I did not understand him. Now, the Senator has called attention to a remarkable circumstance that occurred in 1906, and the Senator from Wisconsin in holy horror says: "That is an awful thing!" Yet the Senator from Wisconsin was a Member of this body when that occurred.

Mr. President, perhaps it is not a matter of sufficient importance upon which to detain the Senate at this time. Yet while I do not say that it was the intention of the Senator from New Hampshire to put me in a false light with regard to a want of diligence on my part as a member of this body, what I read from the RECORD might be so construed. I do not feel that I have been wanting in diligence. I do not propose to let the matter stand in the way in which it has been left in the RECORD.

I became a Member of the Senate in January, 1906. I do not know at just what time the Washington Gas Light Co. took this action and gave to its stockholders these certificates of indebtedness, but, so far as I know, there was no way in which I could be informed about it. The questions that I addressed to the Senator from Nebraska, which might be construed as a criticism of this body, because it did not correct the matter when its attention was called to it, and that it did nothing to give relief to the consumers of this District, all were directed to the time when the Senator from Nebraska, in 1914, brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that this large amount of certificated indebtedness was added to the capitalization of the company. Then the Senate became advised of it. I was present at that time, and the RECORD of that date shows that I supported with my vote every amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, and that I was in strict accord with him in trying to give some relief to the citizens of the District from the extortionate rates charged for gas.

I find that in February, 1907, when I had only been a Member of this body a year, and a District of Columbia appropriation bill was under consideration, I offered an amendment which became a part of the bill. That amendment was as follows:

Provided, That the Washington Gas Light Co., through its president, shall make a full report to Congress annually on the 1st day of January, stating in detail the gross receipts and expenditures, the cost of material used in making gas, the amount used and consumed, the dividends declared, the extensions and improvements made in the plant, the surplus and cash on hand, and how the surplus funds of the company are invested.

And since that time such reports as have been made by the Washington Gas Light Co. were made pursuant to the provisions of that amendment.

Mr. President, in 1910 I made some effort in connection with my service upon a committee of this body to bring about an investigation of the affairs of the Washington Gas Light Co., with a view of securing better rates for the people of this District. I was not a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, where I would have had some opportunity to be informed fully with regard to these matters and have some power to effect some relief. But, as a humble member of the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, the chairman of which was former Senator Taliaferro, there was referred to that committee a resolution. I do not now remember its terms, but it was subject to amendment. I interested the then Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Brown, in the matter, and after many conferences with him, by his vote and mine, over the vote of the chairman of the committee, the resolution was amended and reported to the Senate. It authorized that committee to conduct an investigation to determine the value of the plant of the Washington Gas Light Co. and the cost of manufacturing gas.

Mr. President, that reported resolution created great consternation on this floor. It was the subject of a protracted debate. Senators who were then members of the Committee on the District of Columbia succeeded in having that resolution taken away from the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. A majority of the members of the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia would have prosecuted the inquiry. That was shown by the character of the resolution which they reported back to the Senate, asking for authority to make the investigation and for an appropriation out of the contingent fund of the Senate to provide for calling experts to ascertain the value of the property of the gas company. I can state, from my knowledge of the attitude of Senator Brown upon that subject, that a majority of that committee would have conducted an investigation that would have informed the Senate with respect to the value of the property, the cost of manufacture, and the profits of the business of this company.

As I have said, when that resolution was reported to the Senate the elder statesmen upon this floor, led by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and assisted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], induced the Senate to take that resolution away from the committee that reported it and to refer it to the Committee on the District of Columbia. There it died. There the matter ended.

So, Mr. President, I do not think it was quite fair on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire to seek to hold me accountable as a Member of this body, because I did not obtain within a few weeks after entering the Senate information that the Washington Gas Co. had issued to its stockholders certificates of indebtedness without receiving any money or thing of value for same. At the time I knew nothing of this transaction, which later was made the basis for doubling the capitalization of the company. That is all I care to say, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall enter into no controversy with the Senator from Wisconsin. When the vote was taken on yesterday and two-fifths of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, which committee without dissent authorized the reporting of this bill to the Senate, voted against the committee, I concluded that it was about time to throw up my hands as a member of the subcommittee which prepared this bill.

The Senator from Wisconsin says I have put him in a false position. I did not intend to do so. The Senator participated in the debate and indorsed the views the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was presenting, which I combated as best I could. The Senator did manifest a feeling of horror, I thought, as he looked at the ceiling and raised his eyebrows, and said, "That is most remarkable"; and I called attention to the fact that the Senator was a Member of the Senate at the time to which the Senator from Nebraska referred. Now, the Senator says that what he had reference to was the incident in 1914, when the Senator from Nebraska called attention to this matter. Well, the Senator from Wisconsin was a Member of the Senate then; he has the same right that I have or that any other Member of the Senate has to take any action that he may see fit, and he is not excluded from that right because he is not a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, perhaps I was a little petulant on yesterday. I have great faults, no doubt; but in debate I try to be fair. I was charged yesterday with having "slept at the switch" as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, with having neglected my duty; and it was but natural that I should call attention to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin, who has been a very diligent student of these affairs, and who has, I have no doubt, conscientiously tried to solve these problems which have troubled some of the rest of us, had also apparently "slept at the switch." I did not at first observe that the Senator from Wisconsin was not in the Chamber. Had he been in the Chamber I would have said precisely what I did, as I am not in the habit of saying in a Senator's absence what I would not say in his presence.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator, it seems to me, involves the matter in further confusion. I made a criticism of the Senate, but that criticism was directed to it for not taking action upon this matter when its attention was called to it in 1914. The Senator was present at that time and I was present. The Senator opposed the motion and the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska, who laid the information before the Senate, and I supported the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, I think there is some difference in our positions. That was the first time that the Senate was called upon to act and the first time that it was informed about this matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, and the Senator was a member of the Senate, as I was.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. And I happened to be a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator took one position upon the question and I another.

Mr. GALLINGER. I happened to be a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but not chairman of the committee at that time, and I do not feel that I had any greater responsibility in the matter than had the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator.

Mr. President, that is all there is to it, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin is satisfied with the explanation he has made. I am not going to debate it further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Jones	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Clapp	Kenyon	Penrose	Smoot
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Pittman	Sterling
Cummins	La Follette	Polindexter	Swanson
Curtis	Lane	Pomerene	Taggart
Dillingham	Lewis	Ransdell	Thomas
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed	Thompson
Gallinger	McCumber	Robinson	Tillman
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Townsend
Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Warren
Husting	Myers	Sherman	Weeks
James	Nelson	Shields	Works
Johnson, Me.	Norris	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 12717, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12717) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before any action is taken on the report, I understand that it is a partial report. Am I correct?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes. I should like to state to the Senator that there is but one point of disagreement, which, without violating any confidence, I think is practically agreed to, in my opinion. However, the only point of disagreement in the two Houses is the one that I was going to make a motion with reference to just as soon as the Senate had agreed to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had an impression, from reading the report, that there were two or three differences.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; the Senator will understand that this changes the amount, and therefore no subsequent figures or numbers of disagreement were in conformity with the original. It does not affect that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I did not read it aright.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ascertain whether the report has been printed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It has been printed.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the amendments?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The report has been printed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not had time to read it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; it was printed the day that I presented the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the report ought to be rejected by the Senate and sent back to conference, and the Senate conferees insist upon many of the Senate amendments that they have receded from. I find that the conferees of the Senate have yielded to the demands of the conferees of the House quite freely. I am very sorry to see, Mr. President, that the Senate conferees have receded upon nearly every amendment that the Senate adopted benefiting the West; and it is so glaring on its face that the Senate ought to reject the whole report and instruct our conferees to further insist upon a few of such amendments being agreed to.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some of these glaring discriminations between the West and the South. I have never undertaken to do it in the past, and I dislike to do it now; but it seems to me that if the present practice is allowed to continue, and allow the Agricultural appropriation bill to be made up as it has been made up this year, and allow the amendments that have been agreed to by the Senate to be treated as they have been by our conferees, in the future we might as well know in advance that the bill is to be made up for certain sections of the country, and that every appropriation for the development of the West is to be eliminated, and the appropriations for the South are to be increased and held in conference. For instance, on page 22 of the bill we find that in the case of the item for the investigation, testing, and improvement of plants yielding drugs, spices, poisons, oils, and so forth, the Senate increased the amount from $48,820 to $53,820. The House recedes from its position and the increased amount is given.

Following that, we find that the amendment of the Senate in the case of the item for investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain increased the amount from $88,770 to $109,920. This was for the West. The Senate conferees yielded and gave only what the House provided.

On page 47, amendment No. 55, the amendment agreed to by the Senate reads as follows:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, under general regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the prospecting, development, and utilization of the mineral resources of the lands acquired under the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat., p. 961), known as the Weeks law, upon such terms and for specified periods or otherwise, as he may deem to be for the best interests of the United States; and all moneys received on account of charges, if any, made under this act shall be disposed of as is provided by existing law for the disposition of receipts from national forests.

The House recedes from this amendment. Mr. President, as it refers to the utilization of the mineral resources of the South, but when it comes to the other amendment affecting this same law adopted by the Senate, the House conferees refuse to yield.

On page 51, in the case of amendment No. 59, the House provision reads as follows:

For the employment of chemists and other scientific assistants for investigation and experiment in the utilization of coloring materials, $50,000.

The Senate struck that out and inserted:

For investigation and experiment in the utilization, for coloring purposes, of raw materials grown or produced in the United States, $50,000.

The House receded. Whenever an amendment is agreed to in the Senate for the development of the South we always find the House conferees receding, and the Senate conferees insisting upon the Senate amendment.

Again, on page 54 of the bill, amendment 65 reads as follows:

For the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale, including the establishment and equipment of such plant or plants as may be necessary therefor, $175,000: Provided, That the product obtained from such experimentation may be sold at the market price of such product, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in continuing such experimentation.

It may be said that potash is found in the West. If it were alone for the development of the potash of the West, and if the Southern States did not want cheaper potash, do you think this amendment would have been agreed to? I think not. It would have gone out, like other amendments have the object of which was for the development of the industries of the West.

Just before this amendment there was a provision in the bill appropriating $35,600 for exploration and investigation within the United States to determine possible sources of supply of potash, nitrates, and other natural fertilizers. The Senate did not object to this provision, and the Senate agreed to the amendment I just referred to. It was agreed to by the House conferees, because it was an advantage to the South, as potash is used upon the farm lands of the South.

We can appropriate from eleven to thirty millions of dollars for the erection of a nitrate plant, thinking by so doing it would cheapen nitrates for fertilizers, without hesitation, but an appropriation of $100,000 vital to the interests of the farmers of the West can not be agreed to.

On page 75 of the bill the Senate adopted amendment No. 95, as follows:

For demonstration work in irrigation from underground supplies of water through the construction of concrete or other reservoirs and the use of windmills and other appliances.

We find that the Senate recedes from this amendment, as it applies to the West and benefits no other part of the country.

In the case of amendment No. 96 we find that the appropriation was increased from $103,400 to $105,900 by the Senate. The Senate receded upon that amendment.

In the ninety-seventh amendment—

To make preliminary survey and examination of what is known as the Black Canyon irrigating project in Canyon County, Idaho, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary—

the Senate receded.

Another appropriation for the West eliminated. It is one of vital interest to the people of Idaho.

The ninety-eighth amendment reads as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the existence of artesian water and other underground water supplies suitable for irrigation in the arid and semiarid regions by boring wells upon the public lands, $100,000.

I find that the Senate recedes from this amendment. It is just as important to the West to have investigated and developed the underground flow of water for the purpose of making useful the public lands of the United States and providing homes for the people in that part of the country as it is to the South to prevent the spread of the boll weevil. This amendment was estimated for by the department; it came before the Senate regularly, and was agreed to by the Senate by an overwhelming vote, but our conferees receded.

I was told, when I appeared before the conferees, that this particular item had no place in the Agricultural bill; that it ought to have been in the sundry civil appropriation bill; that it was not estimated for. Mr. President, as I read the bill I can see scores of items that would fall under the same criticism, and at this time I might as well call attention to some of them.

On page 14 of the bill, lines 13 to 20, I find the following provision:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in animal husbandry; for experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the State agricultural experiment stations, including repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other necessary expenses, $216,820.

On page 21, we find on lines 17 to 20, the following provision:

For soil-fertility investigations into organic causes of infertility and remedial measures, maintenance of productivity, properties and composition of soil humus, and the transformation and formation of soil humus by soil organisms, $35,200.

Mr. President, is there any difference between the Agricultural Department undertaking to develop, in an arid or semiarid country, on lands belonging to the Government of the United States, water from any source which, if it is developed, means homes for thousands and hundreds of thousands of people, on the one hand, and on the other hand investigating the question of soil fertility, no matter in what section of the country it may be?

Following that, we find the following provision on page 21:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, $42,580.

On page 26 there is this provision:

For continuing the necessary improvements to establish and maintain a general experiment farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Congress approved April 18, 1900, $15,000: Provided, That the limitation in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph.

So, Mr. President, I have a long list of similar items. I am not going to take the time to read them, but from beginning to the end of the bill the same excuse that was made by the conferees against allowing this item to remain in the bill could be made against not only the items I have mentioned, but many, many others in the bill.

I say to the Senate that the appropriation of $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the existence of artesian water and other underground water supplies, if it proves successful, would be of more interest to the great western country than the expenditure in any other way of that amount of money, or I might say millions of dollars.

We find a provision in this bill somewhere, as I remember, for the establishment of weather bureaus, one in Virginia and one in Wyoming. The appropriations are for the same purpose, almost in the same wording; and the conference report comes back to the Senate striking out the provision for Wyoming, and leaving the provision for Virginia. Is there justice in that? Is it right?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he does not know that the Cape Henry weather station is not for Virginia, but is for the entire coast; and does he not know that that criticism is unfair and unjust?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does he not know that it was estimated for and asked for by the department and the Wyoming one was not?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say this, Mr. President: The weather station, if it were located in Wyoming, would be for all of the people of this country, too. The reports are made from every weather station in the United States, no matter where it is located, to all of the papers of the United States and to all parts of the United States. I do not say that the weather station is not necessary at Cape Henry. I am not finding fault with that. I am finding fault with the bill as it is reported and as the Senate is asked to agree to it. I am finding fault with the fact that items that are of the greatest interest to the western country are stricken from this bill. That is what I am finding fault with.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That we will discuss later.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to state, referring to his criticisms about the proposed location of a weather station at the Capes of Virginia—Cape Henry and Cape Charles—that the proposition there is that the old station that they have is now being occupied in connection with the construction of a new fort, and will necessarily be torn down, and this is really a proposition to erect a new station; while in Wyoming they have a station erected already, and the only question was simply in regard to enlarging it. The proponent of the measure stated that the $20,000 would build a brand-new, up-to-date place that would make it more efficient and put it in a little better situation than the one that is now occupied, by virtue of the fact that certain buildings have grown up since the building of the plant at Wyoming and render it a little less efficient. As to the main point of the discussion, I will address myself to that when the Senator is through.

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. President, my statements are made upon what I find in this bill, and I can not help but express myself as I have done in showing the discrimination that has been made against the West. I tell every Senator that if they will take this conference report and the bill and examine the amendments which were offered on the floor of the Senate and agreed to and that have been eliminated from the bill by the action of the conferees, they will find that the statements I have made are absolutely true.

Mr. President, I have a dozen or so other items that I could call attention to, but it is not necessary. If Senators are interested in the report, and if they have studied it at all, they can see for themselves what they are, because the discriminations are so glaring upon the face of the report itself.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Of course I do not want to take the Senator off his feet, but I would like—

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am perfectly willing to yield now to the Senator. He can make whatever statement he wants.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator has yielded, I will say, unless the discrimination was so glaring as to force a Senator to believe that Members who happened to be on this great committee in the House and the Senate from the South were attempting to have appropriations made for their section at the expense of other sections of the country, no Senator worthy of a seat here has a right to stand on the floor of the Senate and insinuate until he has examined the record and found a justification for his statements.

Now, what are the facts?

In the first place, let us see how many are employed in agriculture in this country. From the report submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture I find that in the 15 Southern States there are 5,407,083 male agricultural workers. In the 33 Northern and Western States there are 5,443,402 male workers. There are as many male workers in the 15 Southern States as there are in the 33 Northern and Western States combined. The number of farms in the 15 Southern States is 3,086,494. In the 33 Northern and Western States there are 3,274,761 farms. There are as many farms in the 15 Southern States as there are in the Northern and Western States combined.

Now, let us see as to the appropriations. Keep in mind, if you please, that the number of male workers in the farms of the South is equal to the total number of male workers in the West and North; that the number of farms to be cultivated are as numerous in the South as they are in the North. The explanation of this equality in the number of laborers is due to the fact that in the South the farms are small, and in the West they are great empires owned by a few and worked largely by machinery.

Now, let us take the appropriations. In 1911 and 1912, from statistics carefully compiled by the Department of Agriculture, the West received $16,857,001.06. The South received for the exact period $5,647,423.80, a difference in favor of the West of $11,209,577.26.

The Senator from Utah, because the Senate conferees did not insist, or after insistence found the House would not yield on an appropriation of $100,000 to see whether or not there was water beneath the surface and in the arid regions of the West, having already $11,000,000 more than the South received, comes here and complains of sectional discrimination in favor of a section that has more male laborers than all the other sections put together and as many farms as all the other sections put together.

Now, let us see what is proposed in this bill.

Total expenditures in 1915 and proposed expenditures in 1916 for the West, $19,570,158.80.

Total expenditures proposed for the South, $11,731,565.43; still a difference in favor of the West of $7,838,592.87.

These are the figures carefully compiled by the statisticians in the Agricultural Department. Of course the Senator can stand here and pick out little items and show that there has been a discrimination; he can stand here and make a criticism not justified in fact, because he has proposed an appropriation of $100,000 that belongs to the Interior Department, that was submitted, I presume, by him or others like interested to the Committee on Appropriations after it was estimated for and was turned down by that committee. It was placed also in the sundry civil bill and was lost in conference. Then, as a dernier resort, it was stuck on this bill, where it rightly has no place. The conferees of the House, being acquainted with the history of this measure, did not allow it.

My attention has just been called to another fact. The Senator from Utah complained of the discrimination in favor of the South. Any man who is at all familiar with the conditions surrounding the proposition to eradicate the cattle tick knows that it concerns the whole meat supply of this country. It does not affect the South alone, but any man who is interested in furnishing food for the people of this country is interested in the eradication of a disease which, transmitted with the cattle, jeopardizes the meat supply in the market places of the country.

Yet the conferees, having had their attention called to the proposition that there might be a seeming discrimination, in spite of the glaring figures that I have just read and presented to the Senate, receded from the total amount proposed for the eradication of the cattle tick, $150,000, when by comparison who would dare stand here and say that for the general public prospecting to see whether or not an artesian well might flow in that section of our country that can not raise rain, and that, at best, where a well is developed only one small town might enjoy a part of what would be found, equals in importance the eradication of the cattle tick, which would liberate the shipment of cattle from the peninsula of Florida to the coast of Maine and throughout the entire country?

The Senator from Utah, because the Committee on Appropriations and other committees turned this proposition down, had to put it on the Agricultural appropriation bill, in order that he might stand here and cast a sneer at the partiality of the southern Members on a great committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator wants to be correct. The Senator from Utah did not put the item in any other appropriation bill. I want to say that to the Senator, so that the RECORD may show the fact.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, as a member of the Agricultural Committee and a member of the conference,

I can state that the question of the promotion of agriculture and the benefit to accrue from this great department in reference to my section had no sectional lodgment in my mind, and I do not believe it has a lodgment in the mind of any man in the Senate save the Senator from Utah, for I have not heard it expressed by others, and surely none would express themselves seeing the aggregate as furnished by the department.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the proposition to eradicate the boll weevil the department did not hesitate to say that it was a menace to the monopoly of America over the world and they had recommended the appropriation carefully, but as an offset they appropriated a like amount for the eradication of certain moths—the browntail—and the San Jose scale that is peculiarly prevalent in the East and in the West. I call the Senator's attention to another fact.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say an equal amount has been appropriated?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Practically an equal amount has been carried in the bill from year to year.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. By a reference to the figures that statement will be easily substantiated. You are talking about an appropriation of $632,000 for the eradication of the cattle tick in the South, a disease that is indigenous. That amount was appropriated to exterminate what was threatening or had made impossible the development of beef raising in that vast territory lying below the quarantine line comprising a great number of Southern States, while there was an excess of $3,000,000 appropriated at one time for the purpose of eradicating the foot-and-mouth disease. Two million five hundred thousand dollars was put as an emergency fund at the command of the Secretary of Agriculture in case it should break out again. The Senator from Utah can find illustrations throughout the bill of unfortunate sectional distinctions, and it causes Senators to believe that the old French proverb applies in this instance with full force, "Evil to him who evil thinks."

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss a matter that has no foundation. I think I have said sufficient. I think I have called attention to statistics sufficient to disprove any contention on the part of the Senator from Utah.

Now, touching this matter, I was one of the conferees. Not knowing the situation, having no knowledge of the necessity for it, I submitted it to those members from the West and they agreed that it should go out. I want the Senator from Utah to hear that last expression. The Members from the South so far as I know did not take any part. I certainly did not take any part, in it, but allowed the question to be practically determined as to whether there was any such necessity that the unalterable objection of the House conferees should not prevail.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, under the circumstances I do not care to enter into this general discussion, but I would rather the Senator would not say that the western Senators did not attempt to hold this matter in the bill, because such a statement would not be correct. They did want to hold it there and did the best they could to hold it there and most strenuously opposed to the very last its being stricken from the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not making that assertion. I say I allowed others to decide it. I was almost practically neutral in reference to it because it was very like the question of grain grading. I was not sufficiently familiar with the processes to enter into the technical adjustments of a measure which proposed to bring relief to those desiring it. The conferees on the part of the Senate receded when the House conferees, as we thought, had stated sufficient reasons and when there was not a sufficient reason and protest given on the part of the Senate conferees. I am sure there was not a Member from the House or from the Senate from the North, South, East, or West who stopped to consider for one moment whether or not it was subtracting a few pennies that might be appropriated to some other section.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator said he submitted this question to the conferees from the West. That may be true, but I know the conferees I spoke to in relation to it never agreed that it should go out. They never stated to the committee that they were satisfied it should go out.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My understanding was that this being a matter largely that concerned the West, unless they insisted it should go out. I think I am correct in saying that it was submitted to one of the Senators, and it was asked him if it was necessary to insist—a western Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. That is another question.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I do not know that it bears on this subject, but I should like to ask him what became of the free-seed proposition?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senate conferees receded.

Mr. KENYON. Was there any very violent struggle about that matter?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There was on the part of the House conferees.

Mr. KENYON. And the Senate conferees receded without much struggle on their part?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senate conferees struggled in the face of the annual play about this and the mileage proposition.

Mr. KENYON. This is the third time, I think, the Senate has receded on the seed proposition. I want to put in the RECORD a letter I received this morning from Idaho on this subject. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, if there is no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

GLENGARY, IDAHO, July 10, 1916.

Senator KENYON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I saw in a recent copy of the New York Times that you have succeeded in striking out the free-seed allowance in the Agricultural bill. Permit me to congratulate you on this, as the free seeds are not at all appreciated by the public. I am the postmaster here, and several of the patrons even refuse to take them home. I have a cigar box full of them standing on the counter for anyone to help himself, but the box is nearly as full as it was this spring.

They are frequently not suited to the territory where they are sent. Our packages contain Lima beans and muskmelons and watermelons, all of which we can not ripen here. The seeds are frequently no good. I sowed some radishes cut of one of the free-seeds packages, and the plants all run to seed before making a decent radish. There are many many thousands of voters who can not be caught with such a foolish thing as a few packages of seeds.

Yours, truly,

ROBT. A. SCHROEDER.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Where is that letter from?

Mr. KENYON. From Idaho.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From what post office?

Mr. KENYON. Glengary is the name of the town.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator know the conditions in that particular town?

Mr. KENYON. I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Has the Senator any idea who sent those seeds there?

Mr. KENYON. I have not. I acquit the Senator from Arizona of sending them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not want to enter into a discussion of the seed proposition. My view has been as long as this policy is maintained the seeds are distributed to the constituency of each, and everyone gets his pro rata share. But I should like to state in reply to the letter submitted by the Senator from Iowa that a Member of this body informed a number of us the other day that he has these seeds distributed, I believe, from certain schoolhouses, and that he inaugurated a prize contest amongst the farmers in his community, and the fruit that came from the seeds furnished by the Government won the prize. I do not care to discuss the wisdom or the unwisdom of that appropriation. As for myself, I am frank to say I believe the sending out of these seeds by the National Government is very fruitful in calling, if not the attention of all, the attention of a vast number of the American people to the interest that the Government has in reference to agriculture and incidentally, perhaps, to the individual.

Now, I have said about all I care to say, and without any passion. I think if the Senator from Utah will take the figures submitted by the Secretary of the Agricultural Department he will see that his criticism was without foundation, that it has no existence in fact, and it was not in the heart or brain of any of the conferees. I am sorry to see that it has manifested itself in the mind of the Senator.

I sincerely hope that the bill will not be sent back to conference, because the things that have been rejected are capable of relief outside of this bill, and pending the time of another they would not suffer very greatly, if at all. That was in the mind of the conferees. I know they conscientiously did their work, and only receded when common sense and their judgment dictated that they should recede.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I am through. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before I yield, however, the Senator from New Jersey desires to ask me a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I came in late while the latter part of the letter was being read, and I only want to state that I have been an advocate of the distribution of seeds. I remember the latter part of the letter said that the seeds were no good; that they failed to sprout. I do not know just what are the topographical conditions or the latitude or longitude of Glengary, Idaho, but, great heavens! it depends upon where you plant seeds. No man would expect seed to sprout if he should plant them in an ice box. So I can imagine, mayhap, the seeds which were sent to Glengary were put into some cranny or nook in Idaho where there is no soil for seed to germinate.

I am very happy that the Senator from Idaho is on his feet. I should like to know, if he can just give it to me, the analytical compound or make up of Glengary. Is it all rock or is it all muck?

Mr. BORAH. I am not familiar with that part of the country. The Senator is mistaken about Idaho. There has been no letter or telegram read here from Idaho that I have heard of.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It was from Idaho. It was so stated. The Senator's ears are as sound as mine, and I would have been able to have caught the name of some little hamlet in Jersey, I know. Why the Senator failed to catch the name of Glengary, I can not understand.

But, quite seriously, Mr. President, we have heard this same charge periodically since I have been here that the seeds were no good. I have received a great many testimonials from men to whom I have sent seeds, from farmers, and many from women and little children, who have indited their letters to me, telling me how good the seeds were, how well they germinated, and how splendidly they fruited. It may be that the conditions are not always the same. For years I have bought seed from some of the greatest growers in the country; I have bought them from Connecticut, a great seed-growing country; from Pennsylvania; and from New York City, and I find that under adverse conditions seed will not germinate; but I do say that the general consensus of opinion that has come to me is that the distribution of seeds by the Government has been an infinite blessing. As was stated here some months ago, if it will raise up a new type of wheat, or a new type of corn, or a new type of oats, and that can be brought about, it will do infinitely more for agriculture and for the general well-being of humanity in our country than many other propositions that we vote with the greatest readiness.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I owe the Senator an apology. This letter was not introduced by the Senator from Idaho but by the Senator from Iowa, and although introduced by the Senator from Iowa it seems to be dated in Idaho, and therefore it does seem that the Senator is correct in the statement which he made to the effect that it is a letter from my State.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought I could not be mistaken that it was from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The letter, however, is not disrespectful to anybody or to any particular belief or opinion, but is simply an expression of opinion on the part of the gentleman writing it that these seeds have not at all times been such as to be beneficial to those receiving them.

Mr. President, I rose to make some brief remarks in regard to another feature of this conference report. I desire to preface it by saying that I am not attacking the action of the conferees upon the part of the Senate. I shall assume that they did all they could in the way of retaining this particular amendment in the bill. In fact, I know they were zealous in their effort to keep the item in the bill, but met with persistent opposition from the conferees on the part of the House. Nevertheless, I think it well at this time to call attention to the situation in the West, as illustrated by this particular case, with which, I am afraid, our friends in the East are not sufficiently familiar.

About six or eight years ago the Government withdrew as a part of the public lands a very large body of land in what was then Canyon County, Idaho, some 175,000 acres, which will become very fine agricultural land when water shall have been put upon it. That land was withdrawn with a view of incorporating it in what is known as the Boise-Payette reclamation project. The project, as a whole, included a very much larger body of land. This 175,000 acres was a body of land lying upon the one side of the river, and the other large body of land was upon the other side. So, finally the Government, for reasons which I will not take up the time of the Senate in stating, saw fit to eliminate this 175,000 acres of land from the Government project, and some six years ago it eliminated it and restored it to public entry; but between the time that the withdrawal had taken place and the announcement upon the part of the Government that it would be finally put under water and the time when it was finally eliminated, hundreds of settlers had gone upon the land and located; they had made homestead entries upon it and had identified themselves with its development, awaiting the action of the Government to put it under water or to provide means of irrigation.

If it were not for the fact that these settlers have been upon this land during all this time, struggling with most adverse conditions and environments, I should, of course, not have asked Congress to make an appropriation to take care of the situation; but the settlers have been upon the land, struggling along as best they could in an effort to maintain and to preserve their entries. It would be difficult to picture to you the hardships which they have endured during those five or six years. They have endured and suffered all men and women could suffer for a home. Last summer, when a committee went West for the purpose of looking over the irrigation projects, this matter was presented to the committee in my home city of Boise, where it stopped for a time. It was then suggested that instead of asking the Congress or the committee to indorse a proposition for an appropriation for the entire project, for putting water upon the project, we should take the first step and secure a sufficient appropriation to determine whether or not it was actually feasible and practicable to put water upon the land; and that suggestion came from the representative of the department. We finally acceded to that suggestion, thinking it a wise one, and perhaps a more practicable one. Then this amendment was introduced here and submitted to and adopted by the Senate. It provides an appropriation of $10,000 solely for the purpose of determining once and for all whether or not that is a practicable proposition.

It has come to the point, Mr. President, where it is a simple act of humanity to determine whether or not the Government is going to keep its implied promise to those people when they went upon that land. It is an act of simple justice that the Government should determine once for all, and that these people be advised whether or not it is worth while for them to continue to struggle with the situation and to undertake a further effort to maintain their interests. This appropriation was put upon the bill for the sole purpose of determining that question, and that alone. It seems difficult to understand how it could be opposed.

It seems to me that, in view of the tremendous appropriations which we are making for this subject and that, that the conferees upon both sides should have consented to retain this amendment in the bill with a view of ascertaining what the policy of the Government is to be in regard to it. It is a cruel thing, an unjust and immoral thing, to leave settlers all these years as they have been left and to continue to ignore them while appropriating millions for things far less worthy than that of encouraging home building.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator that this amendment was one of the last items on which the Senate conferees yielded. I urged it myself and other conferees urged it, and insisted upon it. It is claimed, however, that the committee who went out and viewed the situation did not think it was possible to do anything toward irrigation, and that it be handled as a reclamation proposition, not on an Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I am not going to criticize the House conferees unjustly; but let me say to the Senator that the gentlemen who were on that committee perhaps never saw an acre of irrigated land until they had the pleasure of visiting that country on this trip. The question of irrigation is one which needs to be studied by men who are expert in the matter. Whether or not it is practicable could never be determined except through a survey made by those who are competent to make it. For these men to say that it is impracticable is to express an opinion about something of which they know but little.

I do not believe for a moment that the engineering department of the Interior Department would have recommended this appropriation or that Secretary Lane would have indorsed it, if they did not feel in good faith that there was a reasonable assurance that the project would ultimately prove practicable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Once more, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, what I mean is that the conferees on the other side insisted that they could not carry the amendment; that there was an influence against them on it, and that they could not put it through the House. I want to assure the Senator that his amendment was not voluntarily abandoned by the conferees on the part of the Senate.

I might say the same thing about the $100,000 appropriation to the Interior Department. The position upon the other side, so far as it is proper for me to mention it, was that if this was in the bill they could not carry these two provisions through the House.

There were some amendments, however, on which we yielded without great insistence. I will say in reference to the Weather Bureau station in Wyoming that the conferees on the part of the House satisfied me that it was proper to yield on it upon the theory that the department had not suggested it but that it was a subject that did need investigation. They showed us that, and we agreed to call on the department to advise us as to the places where there ought to be buildings, and we thought that station could wait a year. We were very much disposed to believe that there are several such buildings which are meritorious and which ought to be erected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as to the department's opinion relative to the Weather Bureau station in Wyoming, I desire to say that that was fully expressed years ago. I explained the matter to the committee, and I shall not talk about that now. The reason why the provision had not been incorporated in Agricultural appropriation bills heretofore was because all parties were waiting to see if the public building there could possibly be arranged so as to accommodate that office; and it has later been established that it can not accommodate it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So I understand, but I think that several of us were satisfied—I was satisfied—that the proper course was to take up the subject more broadly of buildings for the Weather Bureau stations, and next year bring in bills for the erection of several buildings which classed about together and which ought to be constructed. The Cape May improvement was provided at once, because that involved the condition of our transportation up and down the Atlantic coast, and the department insisted that on account of the changes that were being made there they were obliged to have the building at once.

I was cordially in favor of the Senator from Idaho's amendment. I voted for it here, and I voted for it in conference day after day, and requested him to appear before the conferees and present it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the conferees of the Senate treated me with every consideration in regard to this subject, and I have no criticism whatever of the conferees representing this body. I would not have taken the time of the Senate in discussing the amendment had it not been in the hope that by the few remarks that I make I may bring to the attention of the other body and to those people who represent the other body upon conference committees the real situation with reference to the settlers in whose behalf I am speaking.

This particular project is not alone of those in the West in this situation. I have no criticism whatever of the representatives on the part of the Senate, but let me make another remark, Mr. President, before I leave the floor.

The Government of the United States yet has a vast amount of arid land in the West, and it is useless, unless the Government is going to provide means for irrigating it. I hope to see the Government go forward with that work. But there is an additional reason why we urge this project at this time, and that is because of the peculiar history of the transaction. I am not asserting that there is any blame resting upon the Government at all by reason of the fact that it eliminated this land from the project and did not go ahead at that time. There seemed to be engineering and business reasons to justify it. But in view of the fact that the settlers had located at the invitation of the Government and have been there struggling ever since to maintain their entries and to preserve their homes, it seemed to me to appeal with extraordinary force to the Congress. It seemed to me a clear case of justice and honor. Here is a vast body of idle, worthless land upon which home builders are settled and which, as soon as watered, will make happy and contented homes. What could be of more concern to the faithful representatives of a people than to help to develop the waste places and favor the brave men and patient women who are willing to make such sacrifices as these men and women are making to get homes?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Did I understand the Senator from Idaho to say that these people located upon a part of territory which subsequent to their location the Government withdrew from the proposed irrigation project?

Mr. BORAH. It is a part of the territory which was originally withdrawn and incorporated in a large irrigation project. Afterwards, for engineering and business reasons, it was eliminated.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I feel that, in justice to the Senator and to the earnest manner in which he stated the facts before the committee, I should state that there was, of course, a disposition on part of the committee to grant this request in view of the fact which the Senator has just stated, that these settlers are there and are waiting to know the intent of the Government in reference to giving them water, but I was furnished with a memorandum—I was not familiar with the history of this proposed legislation—on the part of the House conferees to the effect that this amendment had been proposed as an amendment to the sundry civil bill and was referred to the Senate Committee on Appropriations. That is its history here, but on account of the fact that it was not estimated for it was disallowed by that committee. Mr. McCracken, of Idaho, introduced the bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations of the other House, in reference to the matter, and he had a hearing on it, but the bill was not acted on.

I think that the opinion of the conferees was to the effect that this matter properly belonged to and should be taken care of by the Reclamation Service, and that is my idea now; that it was useless to expend $10,000 merely to find out whether the project was feasible or not; but that it should be taken up in a comprehensive manner looking toward the doing of the work through that department as thoroughly as circumstances would justify.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that this amendment numbered 97, providing an appropriation of $10,000, was not taken out of the bill on account of any technicality. It was fully presented to the conferees by the Senator from Idaho himself; I tried to present it as well as I knew how; and I know that the Senator from South Carolina will remember what I said—that the difficulty which has arisen was not due to the fault of the people who had gone out there to settle on the public lands. They are all poor people; they can not afford to make this investigation; but the Government of the United States owed it to those people that this small amount should be appropriated in order to give an opportunity to ascertain whether or not this project was feasible. I know the Senator from South Carolina will remember that that argument was presented.

The Senator from Georgia, as he said a moment ago, did what he could, and I know that every member of the conference committee will agree that I did what I could to retain the amendment in the bill. It was the very last amendment acted upon. The committee of conference had this amendment under consideration on several occasions on different days, but we were told, as the Senator from Georgia has said, that it would be impossible to have it agreed to in the House because a certain committee that had visited the western country had given it as their opinion that the project was not feasible. I replied to that—and I think I may be permitted without impropriety to state this now—that the fact that some man on a certain committee had visited this proposed project, that he had merely looked at it with his naked eye, and had given it as his opinion that it was not feasible, did not afford a good reason why the House committee should not recede.

I desire to assure the Senator from Idaho that the amendment was considered with a great deal of deliberation and the members of the Senate committee of conference did insist on it, not only for one day, but for three or four days.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I repeat that I have no doubt of the earnest and faithful manner in which the conferees undertook to take care of the amendment, but I think the truth is—and the West had just as well understand it—that there is a tendency among our eastern friends to lose faith in the entire scheme of the reclamation of arid lands. There have been some failures, there have been one or two projects which have not come up to what was expected. Those instances have been well exploited; that is to say, the news has gone abroad in regard to those projects, and it has discouraged the eastern people in their views as to the feasibility and success of the reclamation scheme. I hope that they will get rid of that idea, because, as I was starting to say when interrupted by the Senator from North Dakota, there are thousands of acres of land out there which belong to the Government and which will make fine agricultural land and afford splendid homes when the Government shall have put water upon it.

The Government has made a success, I think, of the entire reclamation program, taken as a whole. There have been some mistakes, but they have been such mistakes as will occur, of course, in any stupendous enterprise. There have been projects which have had to be abandoned—I have in mind now only one, however—but these are infinitesimal matters compared with the entire program as it has been carried out by the Government. In my judgment the committee that visited this project was not in a position at all to pass upon the feasibility of this project. It seems perfectly absurd to say that men who are not civil engineers, men who are not acquainted with irrigation projects, who have had no experience along that line, can by driving over the country in an automobile at the rate of from 25 to 30 miles an hour pass upon the question so as to forever close the door against the hopeful men who have settled there, when the expert engineers of the Reclamation Service are unwilling to say that the project is not practicable.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator should say in his remarks, because it is a matter often misunderstood, that the money expended by the Government all comes back to it in time. It is now coming back and is part of the money that is being appropriated from time to time. It constituted a part of the money appropriated in the last sundry civil bill; it is money that has been collected and returned to the Government in payment of the loan the Government makes to the Reclamation Service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, how much has the Government loaned for reclamation purposes?

Mr. WARREN. The amount that it has taken out of the land and put in is probably more than $50,000,000. The only loan that has been provided is a matter of $20,000,000, and that is loaned in a regular way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have never taken from the Treasury over $20,000,000 as yet for the Reclamation Service, have we?

Mr. WARREN. No; except as to the money which has come in from the sale of public lands.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The money we have taken in from sales and the money we have paid out from sales balance, and that is not really contributed from the Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, they balance; and the $20,000,000 loaned will be returned to the Treasury from the land which has been reclaimed.

As the Senator knows, probably better than I do, certain money from the public lands goes to educational institutions every year; also certain percentages to certain States and miscellaneous uses, and from the balance of the money coming in from public-land sales the reclamation fund is made up, and constituted the only fund used in the Reclamation Service until and except the loan of $20,000,000 was authorized, all of which I think has not been absorbed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, of course the money coming in from the sale of public lands is a national asset.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How much in all, including that, have we put into the Reclamation Service in excess of what we have gotten back from the service itself? If we put it into the Reclamation Service and cause land to be worth something which before was worthless, and that money is paid back into the reclamation fund, I do not consider that the Reclamation Service is chargeable with it at all.

Mr. WARREN. It is not; it is simply a loan.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because the reclamation work makes possible the return of the money.

Mr. WARREN. Whenever it is stated on this floor that a certain amount of money goes to a certain section, it is simply a loan to that section and is not a direct expenditure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How much have we put into the Reclamation Service that we have not collected out of the Reclamation Service; how many million dollars?

Mr. WARREN. Aside from the proceeds of the sales of public lands, we have put in nothing except the $20,000,000 loan which was authorized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But how much have we put in from the public lands?

Mr. WARREN. I should say probably $40,000,000 or $50,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Seventy-five million dollars.

Mr. WARREN. Well, $75,000,000; but we have used only a portion of that. Of course, we have not paid back all the money, because it takes years to develop a project.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that; but I was asking for the present status of the account. We are out, according to the Senator from Washington, about $100,000,000; but we have to our credit a large indebtedness which no doubt will come back to the Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. And the Government holds a first mortgage on the land for the amount expended upon it; or, rather, it holds the title absolutely on land and improvements until fully paid.

Mr. OVERMAN. In regard to the $20,000,000 of bonds, have they ever been issued?

Mr. WARREN. I think they are certificates, instead of bonds.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, certificates; has the money raised by the certificates been used?

Mr. WARREN. That is merely a loan, and there has been used a certain amount of it, or perhaps all of it, in development work.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is to be paid back, is it?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the theory upon which the money is expended upon the land is that it will all be repaid and come back into the Treasury. I can not give the figures as to the amount which has been returned, but it is being returned, although, I confess, slowly, because of course the first years are hard years for the man who is pioneering a farm. As has been stated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the lands reclaimed are security for the money advanced; and there are no such lands, so far as I know, that are not much more valuable than the amount of the debt which the Government holds against them.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. In connection with this matter, I desire to state that, as I remember, a short time ago the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], standing in the aisle, said that this money would not be repaid to the Government. He stated that while, of course, it is claimed it is a loan, it will never be repaid. I merely want to call attention to the fact that I investigated the facts concerning the Yakima project, which comes within a few miles of my home town, and found that the settlers on that project have actually repaid to the Government already in construction charges almost a million dollars, and they will pay it all back; and so it will be eventually with the other projects.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to make a brief statement?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want it distinctly understood that I have not asked these questions because of any prejudice against the Reclamation Service. I am glad to see the Government where it can aid in the development of arid Government-owned lands. I think it is wise for the Government to render aid; in fact, that is the only way that their development can be accomplished. Because they are on the other side of the Mississippi does not make my interest in them any less than if they were in some other part of the country. Of course, if they were in Georgia, as I personally represent Georgia, I would have more interest in them than I would in any other State. I think a Senator is sent here as the immediate representative of his State and should look after the local interests of his State while other Senators look after the local interests of other States. We all desire broadly to serve the whole country. Outside of my own home State, however, I would as gladly do what I could to help the development of the Western States as any other section of this country.

Mr. BORAH. I want to put at ease the mind of any Senator who thinks, as the Senator from Washington stated the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] seemed to think, that this money will be lost ultimately and not repaid. Of course, there is no way by which repayment can be avoided unless by action of Congress, because the land is there; it is worth much more than the debt; and will ultimately pay it, unless the Congress voluntarily releases the western settlers from payment; and I submit to any Member of Congress whether that is likely to happen. Whatever my individual view may be, is Congress likely to release these lands of the debt? So the Government is perfectly secure in every dollar that it has put into these lands; and the Government not only as an economic proposition is doing a wise thing but, I beg you to understand, that in a broader sense it is doing a patriotic thing, because, as I have called to your attention heretofore, hundreds of settlers come from the East, from the South, and from all parts of the country into that great country seeking homes. A hundred thousand a year, prior to the breaking out of the war, passed on through those lands owned by Uncle Sam, as good agricultural lands as lie outdoors, and on into the Dominion of Canada, and became citizens of the Dominion of Canada in order to get homes. That is not a wise thing to permit; we ought not, out of what we call economy, to permit our home seekers, people who have a yearning for a place which they can call home, to be driven into another land in order to realize that yearning.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator a question, in order that I may get this matter clear in my mind. The reason given on the part of the House conferees for their determined stand, as I understand, was that the loan of $20,000,000 is to be used as, in its judgment, the Reclamation Service sees fit. Is this fund at their disposal to be used at such places as in their judgment may be warranted?

Mr. BORAH. It was originally, but prior to the difficulty with which we are now dealing the Reclamation Service had distributed the funds, and there was, in the mind of the Secretary of the Interior, no fund available out of those which had already been provided for by which to do this work. In addition to that, the law prescribed the kind of projects to which the money could be distributed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So this survey which the Senator asked for was preliminary to ascertaining whether the project was feasible or not, and then the next step would be to secure a sufficient appropriation to do the irrigation work?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not have in mind the idea of making a sufficient appropriation for this particular project alone; but the western people have had in mind the proposition of providing an additional loan, similar to the loan of $20,000,000. As will be recalled, the first report of Secretary Lane—which everyone who wants to familiarize himself with the work of the reclamation projects ought to read, for it is one of the most illuminating and instructive reports that ever came from the head of a department of this Government—advocated the loan by the Government of $100,000,000 to the reclamation fund for the purpose of taking up new projects, such as this, and going ahead and reclaiming the arid lands. Secretary Lane gave his reasons for it and showed how safe and how practical a proposition it was for the Government to go ahead with the work.

It was our idea to get this little appropriation at this time to determine whether the project to which I have referred was practicable, in order that the settlers might know whether they should remain there in the hope that they would be finally taken care of when the general loan which Mr. Lane has recommended could be provided for; and, if it was not practicable, after being there all these years, they could go hence and undertake elsewhere to secure that which they have tried so hard to secure here.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There is just one further question I should like to ask the Senator. In case the recommendation of Secretary Lane is adopted, does not the Senator think that in that event this very project will receive attention?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about it, but, of course, under the circumstances we have been trying now for two years to get that. We have made no progress. If we had made progress I would not have been bothering the committee with this little loan; and if those settlers had not been upon the project there would have been no reason why we should single out this project and ask for a survey, but we could have very well afforded to wait for the general movement. But it was to take care of those people and let them know whether it was worth while for them to continue to make the sacrifices which they have made for the last six years.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only thing that I wanted to get thoroughly in my mind was that no matter what might be the verdict of the preliminary survey, actual relief to the settlers who are now suffering would be possible only if the project that was delayed is adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will not the Reclamation Service have funds coming in? Can not it take care of a project of that kind out of the collections it gets in? Does it require a new addition to the twenty millions?

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that, as I understand, this twenty millions, the entire fund, in the first place, was limited by law to projects which were in actual process of construction, so that the Secretary of the Interior was not at liberty to use it for the purpose of determining the practicability of the project; and this was considered a new project, notwithstanding the fact that it had originally been in the old project. But in view of the fact that it had been eliminated it was classed as a new project. Therefore he was not at liberty to use any part of this $20,000,000 under the law for this new project. I tried to have it classed as an old project by reason of that fact, but the Secretary felt otherwise, and I have not felt at all disposed to criticize his judgment; but he was limited under the law to using that fund, and so far he was permitted to use it he had already distributed it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will also suggest to the Senator that under the law appropriating this $20,000,000, after a certain number of years—I think it was five years—5 per cent of the money that came into the reclamation fund had to be set aside each year to pay off this loan of twenty millions, so that, in other words, this twenty millions is practically a mortgage upon the other funds coming into the reclamation fund.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But part of the proceeds of sale of the public lands goes to the reclamation fund, does it not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And part of the funds collected from the settlers goes to the reclamation fund. Can not they take up projects of this sort with that money?

Mr. BORAH. No; not under the law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Especially under these peculiar conditions?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so. I do not think the Secretary feels at liberty to do so; and I think, under the law, that really he is not at liberty to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I asked that question because we were met also with the suggestion that the Reclamation Service ought to handle the proposition.

Mr. BORAH. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that two years ago we changed the reclamation law and took out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior the power to make any further distribution or exercise discretion with reference to the use of this fund. We must now, as we are doing, come to the Congress and ask for the appropriation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the last statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is an illustration, to my mind, of the evils of taking the reclamation fund out of the hands of the Interior Department and putting it into the hands of Congress. I opposed that measure with all my force and power, because I was satisfied that I foresaw what it would lead to; that we would have to come to committees of Congress which know nothing about reclamation, have no knowledge on the subject, and no way of having any, and ask them for appropriations for the various projects. I was satisfied then that it would be a very uncertain and very unsatisfactory way of obtaining money and justice, and I opposed the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I entirely agree with the Senator from Montana. I think without exception all western Senators opposed that change. I know that the Senator from Montana did, and I know that I did.

Mr. MYERS. There were some exceptions, but most of the western Senators opposed it.

Mr. BORAH. Possibly so. I am not aware of it. But its evil is now being well illustrated; and it seems to me that we ought to have left it with the Secretary of the Interior, who is generally a western man, who has familiarized himself with the matters and who knows when he should enter upon the enterprise of a new project and when he should not. It is impossible, or practically impossible, to get that information before Congress.

Mr. MYERS. Absolutely so.

Mr. BORAH. Unless the law is changed, it is my judgment that the end of the reclamation enterprise in the West, so far as the Government is concerned, is near at hand.

Mr. MYERS. Absolutely so.

Mr. President, there is nothing more inhuman than has been the practice of the United States Government to set aside large areas of arid land in the West for reclamation projects, and invite, induce, and entice poor settlers, homesteaders, men of little or no means, to go on those lands and settle there and undertake to make homes, and expend their time and labor and means to the extent to which they have any means, and then either withdraw the project—as has been done, it seems, in the Idaho case—or else just simply fail for year after year, through dilatoriness and neglect, or through the parsimony of Congress in making appropriations, to put water on the land, and let the people stay there and starve. It is simply harrowing and heart-rending to the last degree.

The Little Bitter Root Valley is a part of the Flathead reclamation project in Montana. It is not a little valley, either. It is a large one. The name, "Little Bitter Root Valley," is a misnomer. It is quite a large area of country. Six years ago it was included in and made a part of the Flathead reclamation project. It contains land which affords room for hundreds of homesteaders. The homestead units were cut up into tracts of 40 and 80 acres of land—none to exceed 80 acres in the valley—and it was advertised that water would be put on that land, that the land would be reclaimed; and it was thrown open to entry with that understanding and on those conditions. It was advertised far and near, and settlers were induced to leave their homes in other sections of the country and take their little all and go there and locate on those comparatively small tracts of land, with the express understanding that water would be put on the tracts, so the settlers could make a living. They can not make a living on 40 or 80 acres of land in a dry country without water on the land. You have to have at least 320 acres or 640 acres of land in order to conduct dry-farming operations in an arid country. Why, a man can scarcely raise enough for chicken feed on 40 or 80 acres of dry land in an arid country. So the people were induced to take these small tracts by the representations of the Government that water would be put on the land, and they had a right to believe and assume that the work of putting water on the land would be prosecuted with all due diligence and that it would be put on the land in a reasonable time.

That was six years ago, and there has not been a drop of water put on the Little Bitter Root Valley by the Government yet. The Government is now doing some preliminary work of investigation. Engineers are making some estimates, and I have some hope that this coming fall work may be begun in the Little Bitter Root Valley. If it is not, the condition of the people who have been able to stay there will be heartrending; it will be harrowing.

Last summer I went over the Little Bitter Root Valley, and three-fourths of the houses and shacks in that part of the country have their doors and windows nailed up, and the people have had to abandon their claims. They have been driven off by desperation—by starvation. It is sad enough to see those windows and doors nailed up; but nobody knows the tears, the sorrow, the heartaches and heart throbs, the broken hearts and broken spirits, the ruined lives, and sleepless nights of which those nailed-up doors and windows are mute evidence. They are only the surface; that is all. The real agony, sorrow, trouble, and misery is behind and out of sight.

If the people on this project in this section of Idaho are in that condition—if they were induced to go there by representations that the Government would put water on this land, and if afterwards the land was withdrawn and the people were left there helpless, high and dry—their condition appeals to my deepest sympathy, and I am sorry that this small item of $10,000 was left out of the bill by the conferees. It does seem to me that the small sum of $10,000 might be used to investigate conditions there and ascertain whether it is feasible to irrigate this land. You have to make a start in everything, and this would have been a start. You can not appropriate money, you can not start a project, until you ascertain whether or not it is feasible, and this might have thrown some light on that subject.

I am sorry the item was not retained by the conferees. I think its omission must have been brought about by some eastern Senators and Representatives who know nothing whatever about irrigation, who think that all the land west of the Missouri River is not worth two bits, and who would not know an irrigation ditch from a haystack if they saw both of them. I am sorry for it. It tells a tale of sadness the extent of which we will probably never know.

Some weeks ago I introduced a bill, which was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, to appropriate $50,000 for the purpose of conducting experimental work by the Government in sinking artesian wells on the public domain along the Canadian border in northern Montana.

It is on the calendar now; but some weeks ago, during my sickness, and while the Agricultural bill was up for consideration in the Senate, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] offered an amendment to the bill to appropriate $100,000 for the purpose of conducting such experimental work anywhere in the arid States of the West where the Secretary of the Interior might decide, and that appears to have in a measure supplanted the bill which I introduced. I have no particular objection, because $100,000 is more than $50,000. It is true that the $50,000 was intended to be used, by the terms of my bill, entirely in Montana; but I would be glad to see an appropriation of $100,000, too, for that work, to be used in any section of the West. I would like to have both appropriations. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina, who is in charge of the conference report, what became of that item of $100,000 in the proceedings of the conferees?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator had been present at the opening of the discussion—

Mr. MYERS. I was not present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. He would have known that it went out.

Mr. MYERS. It went out?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It went out, for reasons that I have already stated. It had been introduced in the House, and referred to other committees, and had been rejected. The conferees of the House and the members of the Senate conference committee will bear me out in saying that they absolutely refused to agree to the proposition. There is a memorandum here which I will read, because I was not familiar with the history of it before it reached the stage of being put on this bill. According to this memorandum, it was submitted to the House Committee on Appropriations and estimated for, but was not allowed by that committee. It was placed on the sundry civil bill in the Senate, and it was lost in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. In the House, the Senator means.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then it was offered to this bill; and the House conferees, knowing all of the circumstances relating to it, flatly said that they would absolutely refuse to agree to it, and after discussion the Senate receded.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I know, of course, that this which the Senator says is true, that the House conferees absolutely would not agree to it; but I can not accept the statement that they know all about it. I do not think they know anything at all about it or about the need of it. I think they are entirely ignorant about it.

I am sorry the item of $100,000 for experimental work in sinking artesian wells in the arid sections of the West was dropped out. That is a work that is extremely important in the West. The people of this country are hunting homes. There are hundreds of thousands of homeless people in the East, people who would give anything to have a few acres of land on which they could make a home and make a living, or, at least, make a living in part, and they must look to the public domain of the West to get it. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of good land, good soil, in the West that are not susceptible of irrigation by gravity. Land is in demand on which people with nothing but labor and energy and hopefulness can make homes for themselves—the poor people of the country. There are hundreds of thousands, yea, millions, of fertile acres in the West that are not susceptible of irrigation because the water is not at hand; there are not the streams near by, and you can not get the water; but a large part of that land could be irrigated by the sinking of artesian wells, and it is a work on which I think this Government ought to enter without any delay.

I regret greatly that the item of $100,000 for sinking artesian wells was stricken out. I think it a very important item. In view of the fact that that item was dropped by the conferees from the bill and the fact that the item of $10,000 to investigate this land in Idaho was left out, I shall vote to reject the conference report and to instruct our conferees to go back for further conference and to insist on retaining these items. They are too important to the West to drop without a further struggle. I am here to see, so far as is in my power, that the West gets its just dues.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I realize how precious time is in this body, and I am only going to take up a very little of it. I believe that our Senate conferees have done the best they could under the circumstances, but I do not believe they have done very well on a number of amendments which they have stricken out of this bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question there, if the Senator will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do.

Mr. MYERS. If the bill goes back to conference and they try again, does not the Senator think they will do better next time?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I hope so.

I must say I am surprised at the report of this conference committee. I realize the necessity of trying in every possible manner to build up the dry western country which has been discussed here in connection with the hundred thousand dollars appropriation that was stricken out. I realize the importance of the small item of $10,000 which was stricken out, which was referred to by the Senator from Montana. I do not know the reasons, and I am particularly surprised at the action of that committee in striking out an amendment with regard to the Government grain-grading provision that was put into that bill by a large majority of the Senate on this floor. I refer to the latter part of amendment 165, on page 112 of the bill, commencing at line 10 and including line 22.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the Senators from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. GRONNA] have rendered great service in connection with this bill by their suggestions and their amendments, so far as they relate to the grain-grading part of it. Without the amendments and without the suggestions of those Senators, this bill would have been a failure so far as it relates to the interests of the Western States in the grain-growing section. I was asked to appear before the conference committee, and I went, and I left that committee believing that the amendment to which I refer would be left in.

Mr. President, what does that amendment recite? It says that any farmer may go into the market and have his grain graded by a Government grader; that he may then ship his grain, and if it is regraded at an intermediate point or at the terminal point, he shall be entitled to the terminal grading if it is found to be a higher grade than his home grade. The object of that amendment, Mr. President and Senators, was to protect the grain grower, so that correct grading may always be given at home.

It was to give him the chance of bringing his grain to market, having it graded, and then having the choice of shipping that grain himself or selling it, as he saw fit, according to the market.

The committee, or some of its members, have confused the object of this amendment with the selling and buying. They are two different and distinct propositions. They have no more relation the one to the other than has the grain growers' relation to wheat, to do with the cattle raisers' relation to cattle. This amendment which I offer did not ask for an appropriation. It did not ask for anything except that the grain growers of the Northwest might have the privilege of going to the market with their grain and having it graded at home, and know what grade and what price their grain would be expected to bring. As the bill is now, if I take a carload of grain to the market and I want to sell that grain, I have no possible way of knowing what grade I have. Consequently, I can not know what price I will get until I place that grain on the cars by the carload and ship it to market, and when it gets to its terminal point it is graded for me, and there the price is fixed for me also.

I submit to you, Mr. President, that this does not treat fairly the farmers of the Northwest. I do not believe that this bill as it stands with regard to that will satisfy the people of South Dakota or of North Dakota or of Minnesota or of Kansas or of any of the Western States. From the observation which I have had, I believe that the graders of grain of the large terminal points will look after the interests of the chambers of commerce and the large terminal interests rather than the interests of the farmer; and that is the reason why I introduced this amendment, and that is the reason why I am going to vote to send this report back to the conference committee and ask the Senate to instruct that committee to have reinserted some of these measures that were stricken out. This will not hurt any man who is honest; and this Government can not afford to place its stamp of approval on a man who is designated as a Government grain grader if he does not understand his business; and there is no reason that can be advanced why the men who live in the West and who have handled grain all their lives should not be just as good experts at grading grain as the men at the great terminal points where grain is handled in large quantities.

I submit to you whether it is fair for this body to enact legislation that will take away from the man on the farm the right to go to market and have that grain graded and then sell it to his local elevator or ship it, as he sees fit. I do not believe there is a man in this Senate who would vote to take away that right; and yet that is exactly what this conference report does so far as establishing his grades and his price at home is concerned.

The only thing that that provision does, Mr. President, is to place a check upon the local grain grader, and compel him, by knowledge that his grain may be graded at the other end, to give to those who deserve it what their grain actually is at the place of grading.

It must be remembered that when this law becomes operative it will wipe out every State law that relates to this subject if they take advantage of this law. It places those who produce in exactly this condition: He has to take his grain to town to sell it, and he either has to sell it by sample, in the old way, without having the benefit of this law, or he has to load it on the car and ship it five hundred or a thousand miles without any knowledge of what grade he has, and consequently without knowledge of what price he will get. This will deprive 100,000 farmers in the United States of the benefit of that provision of the law. Surely an unjust discrimination in favor of the big millers and elevator men.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator if the amendment to which he refers was recommended by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The amendment to which I refer was opposed by the Agricultural Department, and it was opposed by the report of the committee as well.

Mr. GRONNA. And it was also opposed by every milling concern in the country, was it not, by every board of trade and chamber of commerce? That is, whatever report we have is an adverse report is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a number of telegrams here from the big institutions of the country from the terminal points opposing this amendment. I will read one that I have. It is from Lockport, N. Y., dated July 13, 1916:

LOCKPORT, N. Y., July 13, 1916.

Senator E. S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Am very much surprised at your amendment to grain-grades legislation, to the effect that grain which has been inspected before shipment interstate commerce may be later reinspected at intermediate terminal point, and if grade is then given as higher than the original inspection the seller shall have the benefit of it. This is surely contrary to simple, elementary justice. I believe that grain should be subject to reinspection at any time before it has lost its identity; but in that case the final grade should certainly rule, without favoritism to either buyer or seller. All business is coming, and must ultimately come, to being done on an absolutely honest and just basis, without favoritism as regards customs, rule, or legislation—no class or section of a trade. I sincerely trust that on further consideration you have or will withdraw your amendment.

FRED J. LINGHAM,
Chairman Millers' National Federation Committee on Grain Standardization and Inspection.

Mr. GRONNA. It is signed by whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That telegram is signed by Fred J. Lingham, chairman of the Millers' National Federation committee on grain standardization and inspection. Now, Mr. President, I contend—

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota further yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Is the Senator from South Dakota acquainted with that gentleman?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am not acquainted with him.

Mr. GRONNA. Does not the Senator know that that gentleman has been here for years lobbying for a grain bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have been told so by very reliable people.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to state for the RECORD that, as one of the members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, this man has appeared not only before us but he has been present practically all the time when we had our hearings; and he said himself that he represented not only the millers of the entire eastern country, but practically the millers of the whole United States. This is the gentleman who was instrumental in perfecting the bill as it passed the House and as it came to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I am glad to get the knowledge, and I believe it is true. I believe that this man has a right to come to this body to assist in legislation that the big millers and chambers of commerce want or to assist in destroying such legislation as they do not want. But I contend that I have the same right to stand here and contend for this amendment, because I represent the growers; and for that reason I introduced the amendment which I submitted and which I hope this body may sustain, because it does not, as I have said, add one dollar of appropriation; it only asks for simple justice to the men who feed the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, I did not mean to say that this gentleman did not have the right to appear before our committee and to be here. Every citizen of the United States has that right; but the idea I wished to convey is this: The bill as it was written and as it passed the House was not a bill written in accordance with the wishes of the producers but in accordance with the wishes of the consumers, and when I say consumers I mean the millers.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I believe that what the Senator from North Dakota says is true. It may not be true in a sense that the committee had knowledge of this, but I do not see, if they will study the proposition, that they can reach any other conclusion. I shall not take up more time, but I shall vote to return the conference report to the conferees for further consideration and with the hope that it may be done.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a few minutes of the time of the Senate. We have here an illustration of the way we do business in the Senate. There is a conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill pending and we are discussing irrigation, and we have also gone into the wheat business.

Something has been said in the debate, however, about the condition of the irrigation fund and the difficulty we have in the matter to which my friend from Montana alluded. We found a few years ago that it was impossible for the people to pay the largely increased debt resting on them by reason of the unexpected increase in the expense of establishing the irrigation projects. Many of us represent people who would go absolutely into bankruptcy if the Government insisted on the payment of this largely increased indebtedness in the 10 years as provided in the original act. Therefore we brought before Congress a bill emanating from the committee of which I was chairman providing for an extension of the time for 20 years. That bill passed the Senate and went to the House. It passed the House with an amendment that hereafter all moneys received through the sale of these lands should be disbursed through the appropriation committees of the Houses instead of by the head of the Department of the Interior.

I felt then that that was a fatal mistake, and every man in the West knew it to be so. It has already been illustrated, though it will be seen in every succeeding term of Congress. The question of irrigation will consume as much time as most of the other questions involving any sort of public rights or public statutes.

The House insisted, and we either had to bankrupt our constituents or we had to accede to the House demand that these appropriations should be made through Congress. In fact the bill would not otherwise have passed, we were told. I was the chairman of the conferees on the part of the Senate, and we were forced to agree to that provision. Therefore, we have the project of which the Senator from Idaho spoke; we have the question on which the Senator from Montana spoke, the appropriation of $100,000. Not one of these would necessarily come before the Senate if we would permit the Secretary of the Interior, as theretofore he had done without complaint from anybody, to have made an application of money from the irrigation fund to the crying needs as they arose, and let him be the judge, who knew more about it in one minute than Congress could possibly know in less than three or four years' study of the question.

Now, we have the conditions spoken of by the Senator from Idaho exactly reproduced in the condition around Parker in Arizona. There the United States Government made a town site, as I understand it, and offered the land at public sale. They were going to reduce the Indian reservation, they were going to put water on it. Those people went to the department and bought the land and put their money into the Treasury of the United States. The Indian reservation has not been reduced; there has been no water put on the reservation; and here these people have stood for years under that promise expecting and hoping that the Government would carry out its proposed plan in that particular.

My colleague and I have struggled hard and with the intensest sympathy for the conditions existing there, we have been given more trouble on this account than on any other question that has come before us in our service in this body. Yet we have been unable to move a peg. We can not even get money paid back to the man who paid it. Under those conditions I merely have taken occasion to say this much so that it may be understood at least that that part of the country is not alone in this trouble but many other parts of the country likewise.

In this connection, about the irrigation fund, it is always getting more and more into a dangerous fix and the money is coming in slower by reason of the enormous expenditures above the original estimates which have been necessary to carry out the project, and I want to put in the RECORD a list of the money received from the sale of public lands distributed to the States in 1836, which has not been repaid, simply showing that we are not asking any more than we should ask in any effort we make to obtain even a loan from the Treasury for the purpose of irrigation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to make a single observation in reference to the statement made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. The Senator is aware of the fact that the grain-grading rider or the grain-grading amendment to the Agricultural bill consumed more time on the floor of the Senate possibly than all the balance of the bill put together.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to have been surrendered more easily than the others.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. When it went to conference it was practically turned over to the Representatives from the western grain-growing States, the members of the conference. Three-fourths of the time in the committee—four-fifths of the time, I may say—was consumed by the conferees in honestly trying to understand each other and to reach an agreement that would put in workable shape a brand new measure seeking to supplant the ramifications of the old, long-established condition. It was turned over to them, and it was give and take. I will guarantee that there never has been a subject sent to conference that was met with as much frankness and such an absolute disposition to thoroughly understand the difference, both on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate. They had a common purpose, and the object was to work out the best means of reaching the common purpose.

I am sure I am stating a fact when I say that the conferees on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate after days agreed on the objective, and when they agreed on the objective it was simply a question of suiting the means to attain the object.

It is not perfect, I assume. I am not familiar with the technical workings of the grain market, but the conferees thought, after hearing the discussion pro and con with reference to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, that after what they had agreed upon had been put into operation there will be ample opportunity to find whether the danger that he fears will manifest itself, and then the statute could be amended.

The proposition of the Senator from South Dakota, reduced to its last analysis, meant that a party having his grain graded at his home market and shipped to a terminal and there regraded, if it were of a higher grade the seller should have the benefit; but if of a lower grade the party purchasing it should submit. It did not seem to the conferees, in view of the stand taken upon the part of the House, that that should be insisted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall discuss this same subject very briefly, and I may ask some rather pointed questions of the Senator in charge of the bill. I hope that the answers will not be of the general nature that the conferees tried to gather together, but I should like to have the information upon which objections to certain provisions in the bill were based.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, as I stated, I am not any more familiar with the grain business than the Senator is with the cotton business. I do claim some knowledge of the cotton business. We have had a cotton-grading act that I took a very active interest in, because I thought the public was entitled to the knowledge, that my people and the country at large were entitled to it. This I turned over largely to be settled by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. McCUMBER. I do claim to have some knowledge on that particular subject, and if I should find a condition something like this, that the grain-buying interest should buy in the grain calling 18 ounces a pound, but that when they sold it out they called it 16 ounces a pound, and thereby made the 2 ounces upon every pound, and that to meet this wrong we make a provision in the Agricultural appropriation bill that will prohibit these interests from buying and selling upon standards so unjust and unequal as that, we should have some further and better excuse than a mere generalization as to the reason why the conferees of the Senate surrendered that which is apparently so just and necessary.

If there was any one thing in the entire grain-grading amendments that called for anything but honest grading, honest inspection, and in conformity with the rules laid down by the Agricultural Department—if there was anything further than that one question at stake; if there was any complex question, I might see some possible excuse for a surrender; but on a proposition so simple as this I confess I am astounded to find that the Senate committee have surrendered everything of real value in this grain-grading amendment.

Now, let me call your attention to the facts; and I want the attention of the Senator to them, because I am aware that some one of the members of the Committee on Agriculture has found it more inviting to be upon the Chautauqua circuit than attending to this matter, and it had, therefore, to be referred to a Senator who is not the chairman of the committee; so I must impose upon him until I can enlighten him upon the real facts which were before the Senate.

For more than a dozen years I have been asking the Senate for a grain-standardization grading and inspection bill under Federal authority and Federal supervision. During the last session, after a fight of more than 10 years, we finally got a vote upon that bill. The bill was defeated. It was defeated by the great grain-buying interests of the country; but all of their representatives in their telegrams admitted—and every adverse speaker upon the Senate floor concurred in the view—that Federal standardization, enforced by Federal supervision, would be entirely agreeable to all, and that if I would not insist upon the Federal inspection by Federal employees there would be no trouble whatever in putting a bill of that kind through. I stated that I would be willing to take that as a first step, but I declared at the time that I did not believe in the sincerity of those who stated that they would be willing to grant that much relief, and I desire to put it to a test upon the floor of the Senate in this vote. Can the Senator imagine any legitimate objection whatever to Federal standardization? I think the Senator must answer that question in the negative—that there could be no objection to a uniform system of grading.

What does uniformity mean? It simply means that grain of a certain species raised in a certain section of the country shall be graded by exactly the same rules, whether it is sold in Minneapolis, in Duluth, in Superior, or in Chicago; that there should not be one standard for No. 2 northern in Duluth, another standard in Superior, and still a third standard in Chicago; that anyone desiring to purchase No. 2 northern grain should know that he would be securing the same kind, the same standard of grain, whether it was bought upon the Duluth or upon the Chicago market.

Under the present system no two of the terminals grade the same species of grain in the same way. You now admit the necessity for uniform standards. Very well, then, if you agree that we are entitled to Federal standardization of grain, then you must agree that we should have some power to enforce that standardization.

Right here we put to the test the question of the sincerity of the boards of trade and other exchanges in the great terminal markets as to whether or not they meant what they said when they announced through their telegrams and those who spoke their sentiments on the floor of the Senate, that they would be willing to have Federal standardization and Federal supervision to see that the inspection should correspond with the standardization. So we amended the Agricultural bill to assure this supervision. We put the teeth and the claws into the grain grading and inspection section of the Agricultural appropriation bill. We made it effective—made it express clearly and unequivocally what you say was intended.

Now, frankly, I want to know why you have pulled the teeth and clipped the claws of this provision. What influence was back of the action of the committee of conference that tempted them to destroy the most important feature in that grain-grading provision? I know that all the great terminal elevators—at least the greater portion of them—which have been growing fat as the farmers have been growing lean—oppose Federal inspection. When we wished to get Federal inspectors employed by the Department of Agriculture, and not employed by the buyers, they raised a hue and cry and flooded the Senate Chamber with telegrams declaring that this would be destructive of the grain business and a calamity to the trade.

Mr. President, it could destroy or injure no legitimate practice. No grain dealer can honestly object to a rule that he shall buy in his wheat and sell out his wheat at exactly the same grade. If he is honest, if he is sincere, if he desires to do business upon an honest, business basis, he can have no objection to a disinterested party weighing and grading that grain. He gets his commission for the buying or selling of the grain no matter what grade it is. The only reason there could be on his part against a disinterested party weighing or certifying the grade would be that he wished to mix two or three bushels of a lower grade with a bushel of a higher grade and to sell it all out at the higher standard. We have been struggling to avoid a condition of that kind for years.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in just a moment.

Now, when at last we have finally put into the bill a provision for Federal standardization, allowing the exchanges, the boards of trade, the warehouse commissioners, and those who buy grain to employ their own inspectors and have the Government issue a license to inspect to their employees, we have a right to guard ourselves by some method of supervision, to the end that these inspectors shall be required to conform to the Federal standards, and that, if they fail to do so, if they are influenced in any way by their employers, there shall be above them some official of the Government, whose duty it will be to compel them to perform their duty and see that the inspection corresponds to the requirements of the Federal department. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I find no fault with what my colleague is saying. Of course, it is a terrible arraignment of the committee of conference, but I agree with him so far as the provisions of item 167 are concerned.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directing my whole attention to item 167.

Mr. GRONNA. So far as that item is concerned, the members of the conference committee will bear me out in the statement that I reserved the right to oppose in the Senate the action taking it out of the bill.

If my colleague will permit me, however, I want to say that the bill as reported by the conferees provides for a complete system of standardization. It also provides for a complete system of supervision in that the Secretary of Agriculture is given the authority to issue a license to all inspectors of grain. He is also given authority to revoke the license of an inspector in case he does not do his duty. The Department of Agriculture used the argument that the paragraph to which my colleague refers was really a limitation, because it provided for 40 inspectors, whereas under the provisions of this section of the bill the Department of Agriculture is given authority to appoint as many men as they see fit, but they are not called supervisors.

I agree with my colleague that we ought to have the supervisors and that the Government should pay the supervisors, because in that case they would be under the control of the Federal Government and could not be under the control or under the influence of any grain exchange. I do not disagree with my colleague in that respect.

I think, however, that my colleague did not mean to say that the bill as reported is a complete abandonment of everything that is important and necessary in perfecting a law that will give us Federal standardization of grain. We did not strike out entirely item 167. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] offered as an amendment to the provision submitted by my colleague has been retained in the bill, although in amended form; and it does provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall—it not only authorizes him but commands him—keep a complete census of all grain that is bought, its grade, its type, samples, the number of bushels that come into the elevator or warehouse, and the number of bushels of each and every kind shipped out of the warehouse. So it is hardly fair to say that there was a complete abandonment.

I do not differ with my colleague as to the value and the merit of his amendment, and if my colleague moves to return this bill to conference on this particular item, I shall be glad to vote with him, because I agree that the item is meritorious.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, Mr. President, knowing the grain conditions in the Northwest, I could not imagine for a moment that my colleague would agree to the abandonment of the most important provision in the bill so far as it relates to grain grading and grain inspection. My colleague says that we are guarded to some extent by the fact that the license is granted by the Federal Government, and, if the licensee does not perform his duty, the Federal Government may revoke the license. Well, if some method is not provided for determining whether or not the inspector does his duty, how will it be possible to revoke the license? There is no supervision; there is no one provided to oversee the work; there is no one authorized to give instructions as to how the work is to be carried on, how the weighing is to be done, and how the testing is to be made. All of that is under the control of the buyers making the inspection at the several cities; all of that is under the control of the parties interested in purchasing the grain and selling it again. The producer and the ultimate consumer are both left entirely out of consideration in this bill. You can provide for Federal standardization from now until eternity, but unless you provide the machinery that is necessary to carry it into effect, the provisions which have been inserted in this bill will be a dead letter.

Mr. President, my colleague tells me the conferees have left in the provision which was added to my amendment and which relates to a report upon the number of bushels of a certain grade received and the number of bushels shipped out of the various terminals. Of what particular avail is that report unless we have some check or control over the grading? My colleague will remember that only a couple of years ago there was a spread of from 16 to 18 cents a bushel between No. 2 northern and No. 3 northern grain, and my colleague knows as well as I do that if the grain had been inspected justly, according to the merits and standards of the two grades, the real difference would not have exceeded 5 cents a bushel. While the grain that was bought in graded as No. 3 and was paid for at a no-grade or rejected price, I am not sure that when it was sold as No. 3 it was not sold for a real No. 3 price. So, it will be seen how easy it is to avoid the purposes of the amendment by taking in a low-grade grain at a higher grade than it is entitled to receive and paying a lower-grade price for it. There is no protection unless there is supervision that will see to it that the inspectors obey the rules which fix the grades and the method of testing those grades.

I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether or not this amendment which provided for supervision of the work at the great terminals was submitted to the Department of Agriculture and what that department has to say about it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota, as I said a moment ago, that Senators and Representatives from grain districts had entire charge of this matter. The colleague of the Senator from North Dakota labored with the representatives of the House on the conference committee—

Mr. McCUMBER. To what grain district does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Missouri was one, represented on the conference committee by Representative RUBEY. I believe the colleague of the Senator from North Dakota did everything in his power to have what the Senate had incorporated in the bill remain in it; but there was a difference of opinion as to this matter, as there was a difference of opinion in regard to the cotton matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the question that I asked the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to state to the Senator, in a word, that I was not sufficiently informed about the matter to charge myself with responsibility, but I did very willingly turn it over to the Senator's colleague, who, I believe, does know about it, and who did do the best that could be done under the circumstances, or can be done during this session of Congress, if we are going to have any law on this question at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am certain that my colleague worked faithfully all of the time to secure the adoption of the Senate amendment. The question I asked the Senator was whether this Senate amendment had been submitted to the Department of Agriculture, and what objection, if any, was urged by that department against this amendment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I presume the Senator's colleague can answer that question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am trying to get the information from anyone who has it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's colleague seems to desire to give it.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to my colleague that this matter was taken up with the department. Of course I did not take it up with the Secretary of Agriculture, but I took it up with the representative of the department, Dr. Duvel. He informed me that my colleague's amendment was in fact a limitation upon the law, limiting it to 40 supervisors, and that there was a provision in the bill giving the Secretary the same power which could be given to the Secretary under the provisions of the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, I want to ask my colleague to put his finger upon the provision that gives the same power to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I will demonstrate to him in a minute that it is not true—that the Secretary has no such power conferred upon him in this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I can point to the provision. I do not agree with the department that it gives the Secretary the unlimited power that would be given if the amendment of my colleague were adopted, because the amendment of my colleague provides for Federal supervisors, which means that they must be paid by the Federal Government; and, as I said before, they would not be under the influence of anyone engaged in the grain trade. But the matter was referred to the representatives of the Agricultural Department; and, further than that, Mr. President, I think it is only fair to say that the members of the conference committee on the part of the House stated to us that under no consideration would they agree to the amendment as it was offered by my colleague.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know that I should state the reason. It is a matter which was discussed in the conference committee. I think, however, that I might draw my own conclusion, that it would mean the beginning of an entire scheme of Federal inspection of the whole grain trade. Now, that is my own idea about it; and, of course, not only the Members of the House but my colleague knows that the Department of Agriculture is opposed to Federal inspection.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and I want to know why. The Department of Agriculture heretofore, at almost every session, has given a report in favor of it. I want to know why the Department of Agriculture, through another head, is opposed to Federal inspection or Federal supervision or Federal standardization.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia in a moment; but I first want my colleague to point out the provision under which the Department of Agriculture makes the fictitious claim that it can appoint supervisors.

Mr. GRONNA. If my colleague will just give me a little time, I will do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. My colleague says he has not it before him, but that he will be able to do that. I will therefore direct the question to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course I do not pretend to be entirely familiar with the grain problem, although I have listened frequently in the Senate and gathered all the information I could from the Senator from North Dakota, and I sympathize with his desire to serve the farmers of that section. I have frequently voted for his suggestions.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In section 12 was found an appropriation of $125,000—

Mr. McCUMBER. On what page?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Page 120—to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to perform the duties placed upon him under this bill. That appropriation was doubled by the Senate, and we insisted upon our amendment increasing it to $250,000. Now, as I understand the claim on the part of the grain men on the House committee—and let me stop a moment to say to the Senator from North Dakota that they were Messrs. HAUGEN, of Iowa, and RUBEY, of Missouri—they were the grain States men on the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not affected at all by the conditions that we have in the Northwest.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the balance of us requested the Senator's colleague, with those two grain States men, to work out what was satisfactory. I never voted for a modification until I understood that the Senator's colleague was willing to agree to it. My attitude and the attitude of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was that whatever the Senator from North Dakota insisted upon we were backing him—he will bear us out in that—and whatever he agreed to we would agree with him in; we were just simply back of him, relying on him in the matter.

The claim, as I gathered it, was made by the House Representatives from grain States that under this provision the Secretary had $250,000 with which to carry out the duties placed upon him by this bill; that the bill placed two duties upon him, of watching the local inspector, first, to license him, second, to withdraw that license if his conduct was not fair and capable; that this $250,000 could be spent by the Secretary, and was intended to be spent by him in providing for appeals where appeals were made, and in performing his duty of watching these inspectors and removing them when necessary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just let me finish. I think I can state it more intelligently, if I go one step further.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And that they did not want to limit it to 40 places, or simply the principal places; that these agents of the Secretary of Agriculture ought to go wherever there was an inspector, wherever there was a question about the propriety of the conduct of an inspector; that they ought to watch the whole work.

Now, my idea was that it was desirable to call them supervisors; but as the department, by rules and regulations, fixed their work, this increased appropriation we gave of $125,000, together with the original $125,000, making $250,000, was all furnished the department to perform these duties; and fixing the number of supervisors at 40 would really be a limitation; that the broadest liberty ought to be left to the department to supervise these inspectors and to provide for appeals and to put the act successfully to work on behalf of the farmers.

I am simply giving the Senator, not my opinion about it—I have not sufficient knowledge of the subject to give one—but it was claimed, and I think the Senator's colleague so understood it, that this entire fund was back of that work. They yielded to our demand that it should be done, and we obtained $125,000 more from them than they had given originally. Finally the Senator from South Carolina and I simply said to the Senator from North Dakota, "We are ready to follow you."

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is too much of a logician to have ever accepted that as an excuse. The Senator would do an injustice to his own acumen as an attorney if he believed for a single moment that any such authority was given under any other provision of this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

Mr. McCUMBER. And the Senator certainly will agree with me that when those who are opposing this bill say that they are willing to have supervisors and have supervision, but they do not want to have them called "supervisors" and do not want to give them any direct authority of supervision, they are not acting in good faith. The Senator does not believe they are acting in good faith.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In reply to the Senator I will state that my own preference would have been to designate their duties in the bill. I have just absorbed that from the Senator from North Dakota, who is on the floor; but I do believe that the bill as it is framed is broad enough to let the Secretary of Agriculture do this work fully, although I do not think it is compulsory.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then why not say so, if it is broad enough and they all intend that he should do it? Why not say so in the bill? Why not make it compulsory?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not answer that question.

Mr. McCUMBER. No one else can answer it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I do believe that the bill gives him the authority. It does not compel him to do it in the way the Senator from North Dakota originally had the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a moment.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to substantiate what the Senator from Georgia has said. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina were most cordial to me, and said exactly what the Senator has just now stated—that they were willing to listen to what the representatives from the grain States had to say. Now, if my colleague will let me read the provision—I think it ought to go into the Record—I will read the language proposed by the department under which they claim they have authority to do this work.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is that section 12?

Mr. GRONNA. Section 12.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was just going to read it.

Mr. GRONNA (reading)—

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, which shall be available until expended, for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including such rent and the employment of such persons—

Now, that was simply added at the request of the department—and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I told my colleague that I would demonstrate to him in a moment that there was nothing whatever in that claim. Now, let us get the true meaning of section 12:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, which shall be available until expended—

Now, bear in mind—

for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act,—

Not for the purpose of carrying into effect provisions that are not in this act, but for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions that are in the act—including—

Now, this is inclusive—

such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

For what?

For the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

And no court on the face of the earth will construe that section to mean that the means and the persons employed are for the purpose of carrying into effect something that the Secretary of Agriculture may have in his mind, but which is kept studiously out of the bill for fear he will use it for that purpose.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just as soon as my colleague is through.

Mr. GRONNA. We were told, however, that the solicitor of the Department of Agriculture held that this would give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to employ these men and to see that supervision was properly enforced.

Mr. McCUMBER. All of this $250,000, which is available until expended, is available for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act and nothing else; and if there is no provision in the act for supervising and supervisors, then these expenses can not be used for supervising or supervisors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call his attention to the other provisions under which I have no doubt the Secretary of Agriculture has the power to do all that the Senator would require him to do, and more.

Section 6 provides for inspection, and provides for appeal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It provides for reinspection and appeal—

In accordance with the laws, rules, or regulations in force or provided at the place of inspection, with a further right of appeal from any final decision rendered under such laws, rules, or regulations, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause such investigation to be made and such tests to be applied as he may deem necessary and to determine the true grade.

There is an elaborate provision for appeals, for inspection, for reinspection, and for rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of Agriculture on that subject.

Now, section 7 provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may issue licenses; he may cancel licenses; he is to cancel them if the persons prove to be incompetent; he is to investigate their competency; he is to cancel their licenses if they are incompetent, as I said a moment ago; and he is also to make rules and regulations prescribing the manner and mode of conducting this work. All through section 7 goes the provision with reference to the supervisory duties of the Secretary of Agriculture over these inspectors.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. Section 7 provides for appeals, not supervision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; section 7 gives supervisory authority over inspectors. Section 6 gives supervisory authority over the finding of the grade. Section 6 covers supervisory authority touching the question of appeal, and section 7 covers supervisory authority over the inspectors. Now, he is authorized to fix the rules and regulations, and to employ such men as are necessary to carry out these two duties.

I have not a question that the Secretary of Agriculture can and should, under those two sections, supervise the grading and supervise the conduct of the inspectors that do the grading. I do not see how he can determine the efficiency of an inspector or subsequently find the inefficiency of an inspector unless his force are looking into the facts for him. He must have the facts in order to act.

I frankly felt, as did the Senator's colleague, that while they were making a technical point upon the Senator's amendment, as they gave us $125,000 to do the work, and put in the additional provisions that we put in section 7, giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power to prescribe rules and regulations with reference to the work of the inspectors, and to require them to come up to those rules and regulations, we got, without their formally conceding it, what the Senator's colleague was wishing to get. I, of course, may be mistaken, but I am only giving the Senator from North Dakota, who has the floor, the benefit of what I gathered as to this language and what we sought to accomplish by the additional language.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the provision for supervision was in the bill when it left the Senate, and every one of the conferees believes it ought to be done, and that possibly it may be done under some other exceedingly questionable part of the bill; then what objection on earth could be urged against declaring it in language that no one could gainsay? What objection could there be made to the provision in the bill, which reads as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint one or more expert grain supervisors, not exceeding 40 in number, qualified to inspect and grade grain, at each of the important grain terminals in the United States, who shall have authority to supervise the inspection of grain at the terminal to which he is assigned and whose duty shall be to secure just and fair inspection and grading, and to see that the grading is made to conform to the standards fixed and established by the Secretary of Agriculture.

That provision is clear—there is no question about the meaning of those words. They mean supervisor and supervision. Those words make supervision compulsory, and not merely optional with the Secretary.

If every one of the conferees believed that that could be done under some other provisions of the bill, then why did the conferees waste days and days in fighting for this particular provision of the bill? Why do that if the authority was given in other sections of the bill? In my judgment the other provisions do not meet it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator wants an answer I will say that I think the result was that they got rid of the name and we got the substance.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should they object to the name if they believed in the substance?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was an objection that it was a limitation and a specification of duty when the broad authority was in the bill to perform the duty under rules and regulations which the Secretary of Agriculture might prescribe; and I think we have obtained that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think my colleague gave a better answer than that when he said that the objection is that if we secured real supervision it would be the first step toward getting final inspection, and that the opponents to the provision declared that they did not want supervision at all because it would reach toward that end—Federal inspection.

Now, here are two conferees, my colleague on the one hand asserting the real intent of those opposed to a clear enunciation of the provisions he sought to retain in the bill fear that it would lead to Federal inspection, and the Senator from Georgia giving his view that some other things influenced them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just let me reply in a word, as the Senator has addressed me.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's colleague was in conference with the two representatives of grain States from the other House more closely and much more fully than I was. He really knows much that was said that I do not know; and I will accept his version as being more accurate than mine, mine being rather conjecture and his perhaps due to more accurate knowledge.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from North Dakota will allow me as to that particular point I will say I was impressed with it and I am impressed with the argument that was brought forth by the Members of the House. In the first place, we had standardization. That was what we contended for and it was provided for in the bill that we should have standardization and the standard should be promulgated. Next you have inspection. After the standards were adopted and fixed they provided a system by which the grain should be inspected. The next was the contention of the Senate that there should be supervisors to see that the inspection should be in accordance with the standards. When it came down to specifying and putting it in concrete form, as I understood the conferees on the part of the House, their contention was that the Secretary of Agriculture knowing the desire of the public at large to have a fair standardization and a fair and just method of dealing with those who sold and bought the grain, he should have a right not to say that there should be 40 inspectors or 100 inspectors or 5 inspectors, but he should have a right to promulgate certain rules and regulations, under other provisions of the bill which gave him the power to inspect, the power to determine; in fact, it made him a court of appeals.

Then he should have the power to devise such ways and means and rules and regulations as in his judgment were best qualified to carry out the intent and purpose of the bill, not to take 40 inspectors, but if the provision was sufficient from time to time to take 200 and send them out to see that the provisions of the bill were put into effect as it was the intent and purpose of those who had framed it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it so happened that we had this bill before the Senate before it went to the conferees. My amendment, in the first instance, was unlimited as to the number of supervisors. It simply provided that there should be one or more inspectors at the principal grain terminals in the United States. There was some fear on the other side of the Chamber that it might authorize too many, and so a limit was fixed by a suggestion on the other side. The limit, fixed at 40, I am certain, is far beyond what would be necessary, but if the conferees desired to have better supervision and they felt that it should have been unlimited, it would have been the simplest thing in the world to have just struck out the words and agreed to the provision after striking out the words "not exceeding 40 in number." That would not have been a difficult proposition if that was the real objection. But back of it is another objection that every man in the Senate of the United States understands, noninterference with the real powers of the grain exchanges.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not know anything about a sinister motive that may have actuated any lobbyist here, and through him any Member of the House or the Senate. I am glad to say that since I have been in the Senate I have never been approached by one of these alleged lobbyists. He has either paid me the compliment of being honest or has disregarded what influences I may have in the Senate. In either case I am much obliged.

But I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that my interpretation of the bill is that the Secretary of Agriculture now has the power to appoint any number of inspectors who may be necessary, in his judgment, to do the identical work that the Senator seeks to name specifically, without committing us to an unlimited number of specified employees, classified, put on the roll, and whom we will never get rid of even though the case does not justify their appointment. If he is the proper kind of Secretary of Agriculture he will see that both parties to the contract get a square deal—I mean the supervisors—the men who are to see that those who are selected for the purpose of inspecting the grain shall do their duty. Under the liberal provisions of the bill he can appoint any number he pleases, send them where he pleases, and formulate such rules and regulations as in his judgment will amply fill the requirements.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Secretary, unless he absolutely disobeys this law, has no authority whatever for the appointment of supervisors. Authority for the appointment of inspectors is given and the methods by which the inspection shall be done. In addition to that a standardization is fixed and appointments may be made for the purpose of determining what the standard shall be and what shall be the character or quality of any particular standard.

The department has all the necessary assistants for that purpose, but until you give the department the authority for supervision the Secretary of Agriculture can not appoint supervisors without disobeying the law. I have no fear at all but what the Secretary of Agriculture will appoint all the agents who are necessary to carry into effect any of the provisions of the bill; he has full authority to do that; but I deny that he will go outside of the bill and take upon the department other functions and duties not provided in the bill and appoint supervisors to carry out what he may have in his mind when there is not a syllable of such authority in the bill itself.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let us analyze that for just a minute. You have provided for grain standards. That is in the bill. You have provided for inspection. For what purpose? To see that grain bought and sold shall be in accord with your standard. Those are the aims and objects of the bill—standardization and inspection according to standardization. Those are the means, those are the objects clearly set forth. They are the heart, they are the soul of the bill. Section 12 empowers the Secretary of Agriculture to put into operation or to call into existence temporarily or permanently, as he may see fit, the means to see that the standardization shall be observed in the inspection where grain is bought and sold. It does not say to him how many he shall have or what rules he shall make.

Just one word further. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] calls my attention to the fact that it goes further, and says that when he shall discover that some inspector or all the ex-inspectors have not done their duty, have not graded the grain according to law and according to the standard, he may remove them. We do not prescribe how he shall detect that; we do not say what method he shall employ.

The Secretary of Agriculture must supervise and see that this thing is carried out according to the provisions of the bill; and I am of the opinion now that the form in which the bill is, when put into practical working, will go further to meet the requirements that the Senator desires than even his proposition.

Now, I am just as zealous as the Senator is. I have suffered just as much from the incorrect grading of cotton as he ever suffered from the improper grading of grain. I insisted that the department should establish the standard and fix a penalty so that if a man graded my cotton or set forth that it was of a certain grade and I, by referring it to the proper authorities, found that he had misgraded it and then caused me a loss, would have redress.

I do not want any man, an agent of the Government or anybody, to send men down to my platform to inspect my cotton or send one to Wilmington. I want to fix a standard and to fix a penalty, and then let me, knowing the grain, have a right to say "I believe you have not given me the proper grade, and if you have not you shall suffer the penalty."

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator's conclusion is based upon two errors. First, an error concerning the provisions of the bill itself; second, a lack of seeming comprehension of the magnitude of the grain business and the method of doing that business. Referring to the first error the Senator says that the department appoints inspectors. The department appoints no inspectors; it employs no inspectors. The grain buyers, or the system, as I may call it, do the employing. It is the system that handles the grain at the great terminals and the Secretary will simply grant licenses to their employees. Now, they are not the employees of the Government. They are not under the control of the Government except to the extent that the Government may revoke their licenses.

Now, as to the magnitude of the business. Does the Senator comprehend the fact that there would be between 75,000 and 100,000 reinspections in three or four months in one terminal? That reinspection is always an appeal. That reinspection is not done through Government employees. The reinspection is done under the present system. It would be an impossibility for the Government to check over all those reinspections, leaving out altogether the question of appeals from the reinspection. The magnitude of the business is so great that the Government could not attempt to regulate it all, to exercise control, and to supervise it through the instrumentality of an appeal. You might just as well say that the appellate court has supervision over all the activities of other courts because it has the power to reverse a decision of a lower court.

Now, remember that these decisions run into the hundreds of thousands in our great terminal markets, and we need one or two inspectors, at least, during the busy season who could give instruction, not simply decide upon an appeal, but to give instruction to the several inspectors and tell them how to do this work and give them the opportunity to view their own methods of inspecting and grading. That is the function of the supervisor—one who can check over the work of an inspector, and if he finds that one or more of the inspectors is simply inefficient call him to task and instruct him how to do his work aright. That is what we need at the several terminals. It is not ordinarily a matter of dishonesty on the part of these inspectors, but under the present system it is a matter of resolving every doubt in favor of the employer, and that is one of the things that we wish to get rid of. We want both efficiency and freedom from influence. To secure that end we need these supervisors.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me ask the Senator this: Under the provisions of the bill, why could not and why would not the Secretary of Agriculture, knowing through the proper officials the condition that the Senator has just stated, send competent persons to do the very thing that the Senator has in mind under the provision of section 12 and the preceding provisions of the bill, using those means to carry them out, to send any number there, to start them off right, to get them moving? Then when complaints come in he would have the proper persons go to supervise this work. If it should appear that the man whom they send is absolutely corrupt and is not doing his duty they would revoke his license.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me answer, first, in reference to section 12. There is no authority whatever given under section 12, which is the appropriation part, except that the appropriation shall be used to carry out the provisions of the bill. The Senator will have to look elsewhere for a provision that would give the power of supervision.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I thought that the bill gave the authority, and that section 12 furnished the means for carrying that authority into effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator thinks that section 12 gives the authority, what objection on earth would there be to saying so in clear, unequivocal words?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the section does say so, but I do not think it says these men shall be supervisors; I do not think it says that these men shall be 20 in number or not to exceed 30 or 40; but take the entire spirit of that section and incorporate it in a liberal, flexible, workable manner, and the Secretary of Agriculture could adapt it to any exigencies that might arise.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have looked in vain to find the section which gives that authority.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to call my colleague's attention to section 6, in which he will find that provision is specifically made for an appeal board, although it does not create an appeal board. As my colleague knows, I introduced an amendment on the floor of the Senate, and the Senate was kind enough to adopt it, which provided in specific terms for an appeal board. The House Members of the conference did not think it was necessary to provide for this board by name. So we inserted in section 6 a provision which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to have a person at any of the grain centers, and the appeal must be taken, not to the appeal board of the State nor of the chambers of commerce, but directly to the Secretary of Agriculture. I want to read that provision.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have read it, I will say to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. It is very brief.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not question the right of appeal.

Mr. GRONNA. There is an amendment inserted here, and I do not know whether or not my colleague has read that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have just read it.

Mr. GRONNA. Section 6 provides:

SEC. 6. That whenever standards shall have been fixed and established under this act for any grain and any quantity of such grain sold, offered for sale, or consigned for sale, which has been shipped or delivered for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce shall have been inspected and a dispute arises as to whether the grade as determined by such inspector of any grain in fact conforms to the standard of the specified grade, any interested party may call for reinspection or appeal the question in accordance with the laws, rules, or regulations in by such inspector of any such grain in fact conforms to the standard of appeal from any final decision rendered under such laws, rules, or regulations, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause such investigation to be made—

And so forth.

That gives the Secretary of Agriculture specific authority to investigate the matter whenever an appeal shall be taken. It may be done either with or without reinspection. That is calling for a reinspection.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that provides simply for an appeal. The appeal may be direct or the appeal may be after there has been an effort to have the reinspection; the appeal may be from the reinspection certificate or it may be from the first inspection; but that does not meet the proposition at all. A mere power of appeal, while it may be said in a sense to be supervisory, only supervises the identical thing appealed from. It does not supervise all of the inspections over the entire country any more than the Supreme Court of the United States supervises all of the courts throughout the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. But if my colleague will allow me, this takes it entirely out of the hands of the local inspection board; and the appeal is to be taken direct to the Secretary of Agriculture instead of taking it to the board of a State or of a chamber of commerce or of a board of trade.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; but my colleague will recognize that the number of cases in which appeals will be taken to the Secretary of Agriculture out of the hundreds and hundreds of thousands of cases where there is dissatisfaction, will be a mere bagatelle; that it will not affect the great mass of purchases and sales by grades; that the average person would rather lose a few dollars, or even a few hundred dollars, than to go to the trouble of appealing every case in which he felt that he was not receiving justice. The appeal method provided will only give the authority to a very few who are willing to pay in time and in expense for such character of relief.

Mr. President, I have taken up more time than I desired; but I wish to say that I have been somewhat surprised to find that the committee of conference, all agreeing that there should be supervision, and we having placed a provision in the Senate bill for supervisors, insisting that the House is willing to grant supervision but wants to do it under some kind of hazy, uncertain language, surrenders the real thing for which we have been contending for something that is exceedingly doubtful. I can not understand why they surrender what they believe we ought to have.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I have not a doubt about the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture has power of supervision under this bill, and that we have doubled the amount of his appropriation for that purpose by our Senate amendment. The place where I think, however, his authority stops is in the appointment of local inspectors. I do not think this bill gives him the right to appoint and to pay out of this fund men who would be stationed at a certain point and do primarily inspection work. I think the inspectors are to be licensed by him, though they are not simply his employees, and paid by the Government. They are independent inspectors licensed by him.

But passing from that proposition, that he has the right to employ men and to watch the inspectors; that he has the right to employ men to see what they are doing; that he can go through his employees and get the information upon which he will base his action in the removal of inspectors, and upon which he will provide information for appeals, upon which he would designate men to act on appeals. He may do all these things under this bill, and I have not any doubt about that as a lawyer. This certainly constitutes supervision, and no matter what the men the Secretary employs may be called, they will many of them really be supervisors.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then he can do it, Mr. President, without saying so in the bill. If he can do it without saying so in the bill, I can not see the objection to granting the authority in clear, decisive language.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the power is given to him through the duty that is placed on him. The duty is placed on him to pass upon the qualifications of these inspectors. How can he pass upon the qualifications of the inspectors without having his representatives about the inspectors to investigate their conduct and to inform him as to their qualifications? The power is given him through the duty that is placed upon him to take appeals from their action. He must have proper men to act as an appellate board; he must obtain the information for that board; and how can he do these things without watching the work of the inspectors, studying what they do, having information about what they do? That is supervision. I think, without using the word, we have fully given him the authority and placed upon him the duty of supervision, and we have given him the money to hire the men to help him. We have not, however—and I do not believe he could do so under this bill—authorized him to name the local inspectors, who would primarily pass upon the grades and pay them out of the funds appropriated. I think he has not been given that power. The primary duty of passing between the purchaser and the seller does not fall on him; that is left to an inspector; but after that the capacity of that inspector, the fidelity of that inspector, the honesty of that inspector, and the work of that inspector are all subject to his supervision; and, as he must be in Washington, his supervisors, call them what you please—his representatives—must have an eye on the inspectors all over the country, finding out whether they are competent, giving the Secretary the information to remove them if they are incompetent, providing for appeals, giving information to the appellate board, and carrying the arm of the Department of Agriculture throughout the grain sections to see that justice is done to all, and especially to the farmers.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it would bankrupt the Government if we tried to carry out all that the Senator from Georgia imagines can be done under this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if it is not true that there is no specific language used in the bill authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint an appeal board any more than to appoint supervisors?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is entirely true.

Mr. GRONNA. And yet we say in this bill that the matter shall be referred to the Secretary of Agriculture. Of course, the Secretary himself can not be at all these points, but it was said by the representatives of the Agricultural Department and by Members of the other House that there was ample authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint the men who would act as members of the appeal board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When the Senator from North Dakota, who has the floor, first began to criticize the bill I was a little afraid that his colleague might not have obtained all that he believed he was obtaining, but as I studied the measure I felt perfectly sure that the bill was properly satisfactory and that in following our colleague from North Dakota on the committee we accomplished what he desired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. Mr. President, I confess I fail to see the force of the argument that merely granting a certificate to an inspector employed by a grain buyer gives the Government, thereby and through that instrumentality, the right to exercise supervision over all of the work that will be done by that inspector. On the contrary, Mr. President, the inspector is employed by the grain buyer. If he does not suit that grain buyer he may be discharged and another inspector may be employed. All the duty the Government has is to know that the inspector has the qualifications to inspect. That is not sufficient. We want to know that at all times he will be straight and honest and fair, and that if he has doubts they will not always be resolved in favor of his employer as against the ultimate consumer, the miller, or as against the producer of the grain.

That might be obtained by an efficient supervision on the part of the Government. It can never be obtained through the mere processes of appeal and discharge if it is found that an inspector is, to use an expression of the street, naturally crooked.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does he not think that the duty to pass upon the continuing fitness of an inspector and the right to discharge him involves the duty of investigating his conduct, and is not that investigation of his conduct supervision of his conduct?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; Mr. President, if you appointed one supervisor for every inspector that would be true, but this bill contemplates nothing of that kind, and if you are going to have every inspector all over the United States watched you might as well employ Government inspectors and have them do the inspecting in the first instance. It would be an impossibility to supervise their work in that respect, an impossibility to compass the entire transactions in the grain through the Agricultural Department.

Mr. President, I wish only to secure an effective grain-grading bill. I want to get rid of some of the injustices which have beset the grain States in the past. I want to secure not only for the producer, but also for the ultimate consumer, a degree of justice. I know as well as anyone can know that it is an impossibility to grade all kinds of grain at all times with mathematical accuracy. We can merely approach accuracy, and that is what we seek to do to such an extent that the buyer of grain will know when he purchases a certain grade that he is going to get the grade he purchases; that the country elevator and the man who buys wheat from the farmer, knowing the Government standard and his own capability of applying that standard to the grain which he buys, will have confidence that when the grain is sent to the terminal he will receive the same grade that he paid for in the first instance. That is all that is sought for by the farmer or by the ultimate consumer.

I want to read just two or three paragraphs from the testimony that was taken with reference to the purchasing of grain. I will quote from the testimony of Mr. Greely, taken by the Senate Committee on Agriculture in the hearing of the question of Federal inspection of grain. Mr. Greely for 17 years had been a grain buyer and member of a board of trade, and, speaking of the condition at his market—and I will not mention the city—he says:

There is not a grain man in the world familiar with this market who will buy a public warehouse grain receipt and remove that grain from storage under any circumstances without absolute knowledge of the grain he is going to get from that elevator. The standards of the public warehouse receipts are in disrepute simply on account of this system and the inspection department, which places the whole value on those receipts.

Then, further on, he says:

I have handled tens of thousands of cars in the board of trade. I have stood in front of one sample table for 17 years as a handler of grain. I have sampled hundreds of thousands of carloads on the floor and noted the inspection, and I am free to admit that there is not a grain merchant of standing who is not either friendly to or affiliated with this organization—the organization of the great grain buyers—who will state either under oath or otherwise that a public warehouse receipt, under the management of this public elevator trust and the State inspection department, is worthy of the respect of any man in the trade.

Again, he says finally:

Why, sir, no man ever thinks of buying grain out of a public elevator, or taking grain out of almost any place, unless he has one of his private representatives, at his own expense, come up there and pay the bill, and have the grain examined before it is loaded into the car or boat. We all have private examiners and inspectors to watch the grain. We have to be on our guard at every moment. There is nothing about an inspection certificate in this city but a huge joke.

Mr. President, we have been struggling for years to get rid of that condition. We had some promise of it in this bill as it left the Senate chamber. That promise, in my judgment, has been surrendered by the Senate conferees.

Mr. President, heretofore there has been this method of defeating this bill: The great grain interests would send their lobbyists here to the Capitol and would flood the Capitol with telegrams directed to their Members protesting against the passage of legislation for Federal standardization, grading, and inspecting. The farmer element from the particular States interested were sleeping the sleep of innocence, assuming that if they were right, of course, the Congress of the United States would listen to their appeals. Through their legislatures they passed resolutions setting forth the injustices that were done them at the great terminals and asking that we recognize the fact that their own States had no control over the terminals, and therefore they appealed to the only sovereign power that was capable of giving them redress—the Congress of the United States.

So far the Congress has been deaf to their cries for assistance, until the farmers themselves in my State and in other States have been forced to take drastic measures. They asked for Federal supervision of the grain trade. The Congress of the United States denied it. They asked for Federal standardization. The Congress denied it. They asked for Federal inspection. The Congress denied it. They presented to the Congress of the United States the fact that they, being compelled to sell their product in another State, had no control, by legislation or otherwise, of the rules which govern the selling of that product. Still the ears of Congress were deaf to that cry. So in my own State, exasperated beyond endurance, they asked for an amendment to the constitution of the State of North Dakota which would allow the State to purchase or erect an elevator at the great terminals and be able to handle their own grain, and escape, if possible, some of the injustices they suffered at the hands of this great grain system.

The State having failed to pass the necessary legislation, there followed a great farm organization in the State of North Dakota. That organization nominated its own men in the great political parties, and with an overwhelming majority it succeeded in electing at the primaries those men whom it had chosen to carry out its views. It may be that some may regard their purposes as radical, but here are some of the things that they are demanding, and they are things that they will carry out before they get through:

The first is a terminal elevator or elevators in which they will handle their own grain by their own State in a foreign State.

Secondly, they are determined now to provide for State packing plants.

Third, they are determined to have State insurance.

Fourth, they are determined to have a system of rural credits.

That element, which was initiated in the State of North Dakota, is not going to stop its operations. Minnesota will feel it. South Dakota will feel its influence, and these grain elevators and this great grain system that have so persistently defied the honest demands of the farming element for honest grading and honest inspection have been cutting their own throats. There is scarcely a single little town in my State to-day where there is a farmers' elevator that is not receiving the great bulk of the trade, in competition with the old-line companies. It is an expression of resentment toward these companies because of their persistent battle against what the farming public was demanding.

It may be that they will receive no greater benefit, because at the terminal they will still be at the mercy of the inspecting service there, and if that is unjust they will still be compelled to suffer those injustices, notwithstanding their efforts. I am seeking to assist them as much as I can in securing honest standards by securing a Government supervision that will insure confidence in every certificate that is being issued.

Why should the Senate of the United States deny them that right? Why should you be so persistent in refusing to put into your bill a sentence that will have meaning, and which will carry home to the farmers of my State a conviction that you mean what you say, and you say it in a manner that is clear and definite.

Every interest in the United States that is opposing the just demands of the rural population of this country will be called to account in the very near future. If the farmers can not secure justice in the only forum that will reach beyond State borders, they must necessarily take all matters into their own hands and govern all State legislation. They do not ask for anything that is unfair. They do not ask for the enactment of any wild or radical theories. Give them straight, fair justice, and they will go on with their labors with patience without attempting to interfere with other lines of business. But I say, Mr. President, that they have been calling in vain for any real beneficial legislation.

Why, in my own State they have read over your rural-credits bill. They are not blind to the fact that it is topheavy, expensive, complex, and that it will never give them the character of relief that they seek. So to-day they are seeking to secure real beneficial legislation through State instrumentalities. There is no reason in the world why the State should duplicate the efforts of the Government. There is no reason why there should be governmental control and State control over rural credits—a governmental system and also a State system. If the governmental system is made simple and easy of operation, if it is made effective, there will be no necessity for any State legislation upon the subject. But when they asked for bread you gave them a stone; when they asked for a rural-credits bill you gave them a mighty system, designed mainly to afford remunerative positions for deserving politicians. They have therefore been compelled to seek, through their own legislatures, the relief that they hoped would be Nation-wide.

Mr. President, this bill will not give the relief demanded by both farmers and millers. It is a step in the right direction. It fails, however, to accomplish a real reform and it fails because the Senate committee of conference has surrendered the most important provision in that portion of the bill relating to grain grading and inspection.

For that reason I shall vote, and shall hope, that the matter may be sent back for further conference.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay taking a vote on the adoption of the conference report. Speaking for myself I reserved the right in the committee to vote to send the bill back to conference on this item numbered 167. My colleague has explained his grain bill so often on the floor of the Senate that it is unnecessary for me to go into it in detail.

Mr. President, the grain-grading act embodied in this appropriation bill is not such an act as I should like to have. There were provisions in the bill when it passed the Senate which I believed were essential. Some of them were offered by me, and the Senate was kind enough to adopt them; one in particular, providing for an appeal board. It was impossible for me, Mr. President, to convince the House members of the committee of conference that this language should remain in the bill, because they claimed that it is provided for in section 12 and in section 6 of the bill. It was claimed by the friends of the measure and also by the Department of Agriculture that the Secretary of Agriculture has ample authority to appoint not only the supervisors but the members of the appeal board. So, Mr. President, standing alone—with the exception of the support of the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina, who said they would be glad to vote with me—it was the best we could do.

There are provisions in this bill, Mr. President, which are just as essential and just as important to the grain trade and to the producers of grain as the provision offered by my colleague. Some of them, although not all of them, are in this bill.

This is not a bill providing for Federal inspection at all. It is a bill providing for standardization and providing for Federal supervision, and for a Federal appeal board, although it does not say so in specific terms. My colleague says that the members of the committee of conference have surrendered. I am sorry that my colleague is not in the Chamber. I was about to ask him this question: I believe every Senator here knows that the Department of Agriculture is opposed to Federal inspection. Now, then, if that is true—if the department is opposed to Federal inspection—is it not reasonable to believe that if the amendment proposed by my colleague had remained in the bill, it would not have been carried out so far as it relates to inspection any more than it will be carried out under the provisions of the bill as it now is?

Mr. President, human nature is human nature. The men who would be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture would be human beings and they would come in contact with those engaged in the grain business. I agree with my colleague that they should not be under the influence of the grain trade, and, perhaps, that would be eliminated if they were appointed and paid by the Federal Government; but it is also reasonable to believe that we can find honest men within the borders of our own State. I am not so sure, Mr. President, that the Department of Agriculture is a better friend of the farmer than of the millers of this country.

I do not wish to reflect upon anyone in the employment of the Department of Agriculture.

They are evidently doing what they believe to be right, and I am sure they are honest men; but they would be subject to the same influence that the men engaged in the business under State inspection are subject to.

The language offered by my colleague, providing for not more than 40 supervisors, would not give our farmers Federal inspection. The language offered by my colleague does not provide for Federal inspection. It provides that they shall possess knowledge and be capable of inspecting and grading grain and that they shall supervise the inspection.

I had to yield on some of the amendments which I had offered and which I believed were fundamental to the bill. One of them was the appeal board to which I have referred. There are many amendments in this bill which are important and which are vital to the grain trade. Under the provision of the bill as it passed the House, a carload of grain could not be started from the point of shipment, if bought or sold by grade, unless the grain was inspected by a licensed inspector.

That language was changed, Mr. President. We are permitted now under the provisions of the bill as it has been agreed by the conferees that any grain, whether it has been bought by grade or not, may be shipped from a point where there is no inspection to a point where there is inspection, or it may be shipped by type or by sample.

Mr. President, I was in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague. I believed, and I still believe, that we should in specific terms designate what these men should do and what their power and duties should be; but when the Department of Agriculture says that this work can be done, and will be done, under the terms of the bill, I believe it is unfair to say that the conferees have surrendered everything that is vital and important to the farmers of the country. However, I have no objection to sending the bill back to conference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe we ought to have a quorum here. I know my colleague is interested in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. And I know other Senators are interested in it who are absent.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments numbered 50, 54, 112, and 223.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. REED. One moment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It refers to the Appalachian amendment, that is all. The amendments after amendment numbered 50 refer to a change in the totals of the appropriations, carrying the amendment out.

Mr. REED. I do not want to prolong the debate, but may I ask what there is in disagreement which makes it necessary to send the report back?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is sent back because the House will take a separate vote on the item.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of House bill 8234.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 8234.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Secretary may read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Interstate Commerce proposes to strike out all the House text after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity the product of any mine or quarry, situated in the United States, in which within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom children under the age of 16 years have been employed or permitted to work, or any article or commodity the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, situated in the United States, in which within 30 days prior to the removal of such product therefrom children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 6 o'clock a. m.: Provided, That a prosecution and conviction of a defendant in the shipment or delivery for shipment of any article or commodity under the conditions herein prohibited shall be a bar to any further prosecution against the same defendant for shipments or deliveries for shipment of any such article or commodity before the beginning of said prosecution.

Sec. 2. That the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall constitute a board to make and publish from time to time uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

Sec. 3. That for the purpose of securing proper enforcement of this act the Secretary of Labor, or any person duly authorized by him, shall have authority to enter and inspect at any time mines, quarries, mills, canneries, workshops, factories, manufacturing establishments, and other places in which goods are produced or held for interstate commerce; and the Secretary of Labor shall have authority to employ such assistance for the purposes of this act as may from time to time be authorized by appropriation or other law.

Sec. 4. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Labor shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any State factory or mining or quarry inspector, commissioner of labor, State medical inspector, or school-attendance officer, or any other person shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States without delay for the enforcement of the penalties in such cases herein provided: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to bona fide boys' and girls' canning clubs recognized by the Agricultural Department of the several States and of the United States.

Sec. 5. That any person who violates any of the provisions of section 1 of this act, or who refuses or obstructs entry or inspection authorized by section 3 of this act, shall, for each offense prior to the first conviction of such person under the provisions of this act, be punished by a fine of not more than $200, and shall for each offense subsequent to such conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no dealer shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this act for a shipment, delivery for shipment, or transportation who establishes a guaranty issued by the person by whom the goods shipped or delivered for shipment or transportation were manufactured or produced, resident in the United States, to the effect that such goods were produced or manufactured in a mine or quarry in which within 30 days prior to their removal therefrom no children under the age of 16 years were employed or permitted to work, or in a mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, in which within 30 days prior to the removal of such goods therefrom no children under the age of 14 years were employed or permitted to work, nor children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day or more than six days in any week or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. or before the hour of 6 o'clock a. m.; and in such event, if the guaranty contains any false statement of a material fact, the guarantor shall be amenable to prosecution and to the fine or imprisonment provided by this section for violation of the provisions of this act. Said guaranty, to afford the protection above provided, shall contain the name and address of the person giving the same: And provided further, That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall be prosecuted under this act for the shipment, delivery for shipment, or transportation of a product of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, if the only employment therein, within 30 days prior to the removal of such product therefrom, of a child under the age of 16 years has been that of a child as to whom the producer or manufacturer has in good faith procured, at the time of employing such child, and has since in good faith relied upon and kept on file a certificate, issued in such form, under such conditions, and by such persons as may be prescribed by the board, showing the child to be of such an age that the shipment, delivery for shipment, or transportation was not prohibited by this act. Any person who knowingly makes a false statement or presents false evidence in or in relation to any such certificate or application therefor shall be amenable to prosecution and to the fine or imprisonment provided by this section for violations of this act. In any State designated by the board, an employment certificate or other similar paper as to the age of the child, issued under the laws of that State and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall have the same force and effect as a certificate herein provided for.

Sec. 6. That the word "person" as used in this act shall be construed to include any individual or corporation or the members of any partnership or other unincorporated association. The term "ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce" as used in this act means to transport or to ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to or through any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any foreign country; and in the case of a dealer means only to transport or to ship or deliver for shipment from the State, Territory, or district of manufacture or production.

Sec. 7. That this act shall take effect from and after one year from the date of its passage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in discussing this bill it is not my purpose to attempt to exhaust the subject, but rather to present some matters which from my viewpoint may be of practical assistance to Senators in determining the issues as they are now presented to the Senate. Believing that it will facilitate the business of the Senate and the passage of the bill, I prefer not to yield to interruptions for controversial purposes. I shall, of course, be glad to be interrupted by any Senator to whom I have not made or to whom I am not making my position clear. I believe that as to controversial colloquies it is fairer to the Senate and a better form of procedure that Senators should present their own views in their own time. If I am permitted to proceed in this order I shall very nearly be able to conclude my remarks this afternoon before the hour for recess arrives.

The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce has reported to the Senate an amendment to the House bill in the nature of a substitute. In the course of such remarks as I shall make, an effort will be made to explain the provisions of the Senate substitute and to compare it with the House bill before proceeding with the broader issues relating to the policy and the constitutionality of Federal child-labor legislation.

Some of the differences between the bill as reported by the Senate committee and the bill as passed by the House are important, and invite careful consideration. The first difference to which I call your attention is that while the House bill seeks to exclude from interstate commerce the products of mines, quarries, canneries, workshops, and factories and other manufacturing establishments into which child labor, proscribed and deemed objectionable by both bills, has entered, the Senate bill forbids the shipment in interstate commerce of the products of any mine, quarry, cannery, workshop, factory, or other manufacturing establishment if within 30 days prior to the removal of such products from such mine, quarry, cannery, workshop, or other manufacturing establishment child labor proscribed by the bill has been employed in the producing establishment.

To express the distinction in another way, the House bill stigmatizes the particular product into which proscribed child labor has entered, while the Senate bill stigmatizes the product of the plant employing child labor. I think that is a clear statement of one of the principal differences between the Senate bill and the House bill.

The primary reason which moved the Senate committee to recommend this change in the proposed legislation is to obviate difficulties in the enforcement of the law, if the bill as passed by the other House should become a law.

The framers of the House provision recognized the practical impossibility of proving that forbidden child labor has entered into the production of a specific article without the enactment of a rule of evidence relieving in part from that difficulty, and accordingly inserted section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. Proof of the employment within 60 days prior to the shipment of such product therefrom (first) in a mine or quarry of a child under the age of 16 years, or (second) in a mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment (a) of a child under the age of 14 years, or (b) of a child between the ages of 14 years and 16 years for more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m., shall be prima facie evidence that such product has been produced in whole or in part by the labor of such a child.

The necessity for any such rule of evidence does not exist if the Senate provision is agreed to. Moreover, the Senate plan seems simpler than the House plan, and the more effective to accomplish the end sought—the suppression of child labor through the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce.

In communities where a Federal act may be regarded as particularly necessary, a defendant's statement that proscribed child labor has not entered into the production of the goods shipped, or sought to be shipped, will probably be accepted unless additional proof is submitted by the Government, and if such additional proof must be had it might as well be introduced in the first instance. In other words, the presumption of fact raised in section 2 of the House bill would not materially aid the Government in establishing its case where defense is made. The Senate committee therefore recommends that the prohibition be directed against the shipment of the product of a plant in which child labor has been employed, rather than against the shipment of a particular product into which child labor has entered. The Senate provision will deny the instrumentalities and channels of interstate commerce to persons engaged in a business which is shocking to the moral sense of the Nation, and which is believed to be prejudicial to its welfare. The Senate amendment in this particular is less burdensome to commerce than the House measure, is simpler and more easily enforced, and I believe it is, for these reasons, to be preferred.

2. The House bill relates only to interstate commerce, while the Senate substitute extends the prohibition to shipments in foreign commerce as well.

No reason suggests itself supporting a prohibition as to interstate commerce not equally applicable to foreign commerce. If the power to regulate commerce is to be exercised by Congress in the interest of protecting the public against such child labor as is generally regarded objectionable, the same reasons apply to the shipment of products to foreign countries as among the States, and to limit the regulation to interstate commerce would be to provide only a partial remedy.

3. The third particular in which we believe the Senate substitute is superior to the House bill is found in the fact that the House bill applies to "dealers" generally, whether in the State of production or manufacture, or in any other State, while the Senate bill limits the prohibitions and penalties, in so far as dealers are concerned, to the State of production or manufacture. To require dealers, wherever doing business, to provide themselves with the guaranties contemplated by the bill in order to obtain immunity from prosecution, seems an unreasonable burden upon commerce. It seems unnecessary, and, therefore, quite undesirable, to require a dealer in California to provide himself with a guaranty from the manufacturer or producer in Illinois that objectionable child labor has not entered into the article or been employed within 30 days before its removal in order that he may safely ship the product. In this particular the bill is submitted to the Senate has been greatly improved. The Senate substitute relieves all dealers outside the State of production or manufacture from any liability whatever. It permits dealers within the State of production or manufacture to provide themselves with guaranties, and if they do so in good faith they are immune from any liability to prosecution. If the guaranty is false, the manufacturer or producer issuing it is liable to the penalties. It does not seem to me that this feature requires further argument. To state it is sufficient. The most ardent advocates of a Federal child-labor act ought not to desire to burden commerce unnecessarily or unreasonably.

4. Another particular in which the Senate substitute may be regarded as an improvement over the House bill is in the provision for the protection of producers and manufacturers who in good faith desire to obey the law. Immunity from liability to prosecution may be obtained if the manufacturer or producer has in good faith procured at the time of employing any child a certificate and in good faith relied upon it showing the child to be of a proper age. If a false certificate is made as to the age of the child, the person making it is penalized. Such certificates are to be used in such form and under such conditions and by such persons as may be prescribed by the Federal board contemplated by both the House and the Senate bill, consisting of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. In any State designated by the board an employment certificate or other similar paper as to the age of the child, issued under the laws of that State and in harmony with the Federal act, may be given the same force as the certificate provided for in the Senate substitute. The House bill contains no such provision. Producers and manufacturers who desire to obey the law ought not to be liable for its unintentional violation, which would seem to be possible under the House bill.

5. The fifth important particular in which the Senate bill is favored over the House bill is in relieving against the necessity for the manufacturer or producer procuring guaranties whenever they ship the finished product in interstate commerce that objectionable child labor has not entered into the manufactured parts which they assemble or use in manufacturing or producing the finished product. In this particular the House bill is not quite clear; but it seems possible, at least, that the manufacturer of shoes, for instance, might be required, in order to protect himself against the possibility of prosecution, to obtain guaranties from other manufacturers who have produced the soles, uppers, nails, and so forth, which entered into the finished product.

The standards as to ages at which children may properly be worked and the penalties in both bills are the same.

While it has been impossible to relieve from every vexation and annoyance which such legislation necessarily imposes upon commerce, it has been the effort in submitting the Senate substitute to minimize the embarrassments resulting to commerce without materially impairing the value or effectiveness of the legislation. While those of us who have had part in the work know that the Senate measure is not perfect, we regard it as a material improvement, fairly calculated to work out the ends and aims of those who regard uncontrolled child labor under present conditions as a national evil worthy of the attention of the Congress and fairly within its regulative power over commerce. To summarize the pending provisions reported by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Producers, manufacturers, or dealers are forbidden by section 1 of the act to ship or attempt to ship in interstate commerce the products of a mine or quarry in which children under the age of 16 years have been employed within 30 days prior to the removal of such products from the mine or quarry; as to canneries, workshops, and factories the same prohibition applies if, within 30 days prior to the removal, children under 14 years of age have been employed or children between 14 and 16 have been employed for more than eight hours in any one day or for more than six days in any one week.

Section 2 of the Senate substitute designates the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor a board to make and publish uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of the act, and is identical with section 3 of the House bill.

Section 3 of the Senate substitute authorizes the Secretary of Labor, or anyone authorized by him, to enter and inspect all manufacturing establishments and other places in which prodacts of the same are held for shipment, and this section is identical with section 4 of the House bill.

As already explained, section 2 of the House bill creating a rule of evidence is eliminated from the Senate bill, because if the Senate substitute is adopted it becomes unnecessary.

Section 4 of the Senate substitute imposes upon United States district attorneys the duty of prosecuting violations of the act upon satisfactory information, and is identical with section 5 of the House bill.

The penalties in both bills are closely analogous, being a fine of $200 for the first offense and for every subsequent offense not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

As already explained, if the Senate substitute is agreed to no dealer outside the State of production or manufacture can be prosecuted, and dealers within the State may protect themselves by guaranties from the manufacturer or producer. The manufacturer or producer may likewise be protected against the unintentional employment of children under forbidden ages by certificates from such persons and under such conditions as the board may prescribe.

Having tried to explain the provisions of the pending Senate substitute, and to compare the same with the House bill, I now desire to discuss briefly some of the grounds of the necessity and justification for Federal legislation on the subject of child labor. I shall not attempt to cover fully this feature of the issue. Other Senators who will follow me are more familiar with it than I and are better able to present it to the consideration of the Senate.

It is urged by those who oppose this legislation that the entire subject is fairly within the police power of the respective States. It is said that many of the States have already passed similar legislation directed against the abuses or evils of child labor, and that wherever abuses still exist the same may be corrected by State action. In reply to this argument it may be said that no State can enter the domain of legislation delegated by the Federal Constitution to the Congress. No State can invoke or apply regulations in interstate commerce to the suppression of child-labor evils. The regulation of interstate and foreign commerce having been delegated to the Federal Government the Congress alone can deal with the subject as a national evil, in so far as it thrives by or through interstate commerce.

I do not now discuss the validity of the proposed legislation, but will take that up later. It is undoubtedly true that the States, in the exercise of the police power, can enact child-labor legislation; and it is also true that many of them have already done so. On the other hand, some of the States still have no 14-year limitation as to the labor of children in mines, quarries, canneries, workshops, and factories; and in some of the other States no adequate provision exists.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly specify the States to which he refers?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the States of North Carolina, New Mexico, and Wyoming are particularly to be mentioned among those States. I want it to be distinctly understood that I am not reflecting upon any State, but I am making the point that all the States have not acted in the matter, while many of them have already done so.

Approximately 23 States, including the three that I have just mentioned at the request of the Senator from Georgia, have what I take the liberty of terming inadequate child-labor legislation. I do not intend by that term to invite controversy as to whether in any particular State child-labor legislation is adequate or not; but I mean as compared with the standards that are contemplated by the legislation in most of the States that have taken a progressive stand upon the subject and such standards as are formulated by the pending bill. Public sentiment has, no doubt, compelled legislation in nearly all the States, but there is quite a lack of uniformity in 23 of these States, owing in part to the fact that influential interests have controlled legislation on the subject to promote their own profits rather than to conserve child welfare.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. I take pleasure in yielding to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator kindly name the States to which he refers?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have a list of the States here, but it has been published heretofore.

Mr. POMERENE. I will not trouble the Senator, then.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is contained in the report which I made on the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I did not understand that the Senator intended to say—I just want to correct what I think some Senators did understand him to say—that North Carolina did not have a child-labor law.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I did not say that. I said that North Carolina did not have an adequate child-labor law; and I will present another view of the conditions in North Carolina before I am through.

If Congress, under the commerce clause, can deal with the subject at all, it can compel the recognition of uniform standards throughout the country, compel the enforcement or observance of the law and thus benefit the whole public. Another evidence of the necessity for Federal legislation is seen when one realizes that in some of the States no adequate provision is made for the enforcement of existing child-labor laws. Such statutes as have been enacted are, in large part, disregarded. And I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina, without inviting controversy on the subject, that I place the State of North Carolina within that class; that according to my understanding it neither has an adequate child-labor law nor is the law that is on the statute books fairly and fully enforced for lack of proper machinery.

Thousands of children reside and work in States which have by local laws prescribed substantially the same requirements as to age and work contained in this bill. In the States mentioned above as not having a local prohibition of child labor under 14 years in factories or other manufacturing establishments, approximately 10,000 children are employed in the industries affected under the age limit contemplated by this bill.

A more detailed statement of the provisions of the laws enacted by various States is found in the hearings on this bill and in the report.

UNIFORMITY.

Child-labor legislation is one of the subjects generally regarded as meriting uniform legislation. The American Bar Association some years ago recommended a uniform child-labor bill for adoption by the various States, substantially in conformity to the provisions of this bill. Most of the States, as already stated, have recognized the evils existing in unrestrained child labor and have sought to suppress them by legislation. There can be no question as to public opinion concerning this measure. The people of the United States are overwhelmingly in favor of it. It passed the body at the other end of this Capitol by a practically unanimous vote, and I think it will pass the Senate with only a few votes—probably not exceeding 12—against it.

It has been said that the principal opposition to child-labor legislation comes from the Southern States, wherein are large manufacturing interests, principally cotton mills, employing child labor. Yet, with one or two notable exceptions, these States have already passed child-labor laws analogous to the pending measure, and these laws have been enacted in most instances in spite of and over the opposition of the industries and organizations employing child labor. There is no doubt serious opposition to the measure in some of these States, and that opposition will, in the course of this debate, find expression on the floor of the Senate. Of course, Senators and Representatives in Congress are presumed to be familiar with public opinion among their respective constituencies. Nevertheless, I point out to the Congress that in the States voicing their opposition to this measure in Congress Federal child-labor legislation has found strong advocacy; that the case has gained strength; that the press of these States is denouncing as unfair and unrepresentative the attitude of those who oppose the legislation.

I do not mean that all of the newspapers in any of the States to which I shall refer assumed that attitude, but I do mean that many of the representative newspapers in the States of Alabama, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, and Louisiana are strongly in favor of the legislation.

I have on my desk a large number of editorials clipped from newspapers in the States I have mentioned. It is not my purpose to read those editorials, but I shall print them as an appendix to my remarks, not for the purpose of telling the United States Senate that representatives from these States in the Senate or in the body at the other end of the Capitol do not know the views of their constituents but to demonstrate conclusively that there is an active and aggressive public sentiment in those States in favor of this legislation, and that the question even there is not entirely one-sided. I am going to refer to just a few of these editorials for the purpose of illustrating how strong and how aggressive is this growing public sentiment.

In support of this declaration I shall print in an appendix to my remarks newspaper clippings and extracts from the leading journals published in North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Virginia, and Louisiana. These editorials unqualifiedly support the policy of the Federal child-labor legislation, and some of them are quite aggressive in characterizing as selfish and mercenary local opposition to the legislation.

The New Orleans Picayune, for instance, declares that the present system of working children in mines and factories is abominable, is against every instinct of humanity, and that it is absurd to say that southern mills can not compete with establishments in other sections of the country.

The Galveston (Tex.) Tribune argues that while children should be encouraged to work, burdens proper for adult persons should not be imposed upon youthful shoulders, nor should the hours of toil be lengthened until the frail body weakens under the load. In this editorial it is pointed out that while the parent has a right to the profits of the child's earnings, still the child is not a chattel of the parent, and therefore no right exists in the parent to dwarf his body, stifle his aspirations, or impair his prospects for vigorous maturity.

The Roanoke (Va.) World declares that if the question of preventing child labor could be submitted to the citizens of Roanoke it would pass by an overwhelming vote, if not by a unanimous vote:

Roanoke is for the child first, last, and always, and it hangs its head in shame that men can sell the child's rights and the child's future for the perpetuation of material advantages. Roanoke is opposed to slavery of every sort, and it hates with all its heart the slavery that would barter the lives of God's precious charges for gain.

The New Decatur (Ala.) Daily says of those who oppose Federal child-labor legislation:

What argument can these men advance? There is but one—that it means money in the pockets of the textile producers for the childhood of Alabama to be deprived of its inalienable right to growth and development.

The Greenville Circle (S. C.) strongly advocates the legislation and declares that the remonstrances against the bill submitted to Congress were circulated by the mill owners who believe the reform will interfere with their business. I shall not review many of these newspaper editorials published in the States whose Representatives oppose in Congress the passage of this bill.

The Charleston (S. C.) Review says:

The mill owners had an idea they could run their factories forever on the cheap labor of infants. But the people tired of this sort of business and were compelled to appeal to the people at large in order to save the children, with the result that the popular branch of Congress passed the bill for their relief, and it is hoped by all lovers of little children that the Senate will do likewise by them.

The Mississippi Land Leader says, in part:

When little boys and girls, full of life and hope, are taken into the front door of a factory, where their growth is stunted, their lives blighted, and their health broken, and then, when their energy has been sapped, thrown out at the back door on the scrap heap of humanity like a worn-out piece of machinery, it is time for the lawmakers from every State to take a positive stand against such practices, whether such conditions exist at home or elsewhere.

The Atlanta (Ga.) Way, strongly advocating the bill, bitterly criticizes those who oppose it in the body at the other end of this Capitol, and declares:

Let us hope for the honor of the Nation and for the sake of the decencies and the humanities that there will arise no defender of this child slavery when the Keating bill is put upon its passage in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the name of that paper?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Atlanta (Ga.) Way.

Mr. HARDWICK. Wave?

Mr. ROBINSON. Way.

Mr. HARDWICK. I never heard of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have on my desk a large number of editorials from Georgia papers. I call attention to one from the Gainesville Herald. I will not read all of it. In part it reads as follows:

Rob the children to-day of their vitality—coin it into money—and an impotent generation will curse the Nation to-morrow. This is not a matter of sectionalism; it is not a matter of hate. It is a matter of statesmanship; it is a matter of patriotism. It is not a matter of expediency, but it is a matter of humanity.

To the Christian the child being devitalized in a sweatshop is like the man in the parable who fell among thieves, and the statesman who leaves it there is the Levite who passes by on the other side—who could rescue the child, but will not.

The Savannah Labor Herald says:

Three cheers for the Members of Congress who supported the Keating-Owen child-labor bill, which scored such a success! The vote was 337 to 46. It is to be hoped that the Senate will give it equally as large a majority.

In another editorial the same periodical makes this declaration:

How is it possible for a child trudging into the mill at break of day and leaving when the shades of night begin to fall to acquire a liberal education? How can such a child succeed in getting even the rudiments of an education? What condition is such a child in, physically and mentally, to wrestle with the "three R's" by the light of a lamp? We wonder if the committee listening to these captives of industry were bunked by these ridiculous statements. We wonder if they care.

Mr. President, I have a large number of other editorials, a number of them from Georgia newspapers published in Macon, Augusta, and elsewhere in that State of a similar tenor to those just read. I will not impose upon the patience of the Senate to read them now.

A number of newspapers have published interviews from southern statesmen in which it is declared that certain States will reverse their long-time political attitude in the coming election if this bill is passed. Nevertheless every political party seriously claiming support in this campaign has declared in favor of the measure. The Democratic platform expressly announces for its speedy enactment. The Republicans say they favor it and the Progressives are unanimously for it. So if the Democrats in North Carolina or elsewhere change their political attitude in this election on account of this bill, to be consistent they will have to create themselves a new party. The argument seems neither frank nor sincere. The fact is, general public sentiment throughout the United States is in favor of the law, and this accounts for the repeated efforts to inject politics into its consideration.

First. Attention is now directed to the very vital question, Is the proposed measure a valid exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce?

Opposition to the bill, however firmly it may, in fact, be embedded in the policy of the legislation, advances its front along the line of alleged unconstitutionality. This issue is serious, but it need not be alarming. Every progressive measure which Congress has enacted during the past 20 years has encountered opposition on this ground from some of the ablest lawyers in the country. It becomes important, therefore, to examine the grounds of the contention that the act is unconstitutional. Of course, it is the duty of every Senator to examine the bill, and if any Senator is convinced that it is unconstitutional he will not and can not support it. On the other hand, the question of constitutionality is a subject to be determined finally by the courts, if the majority of the Senators here find it consistent with their high duty to support the legislation.

The principal contentions of those opposing the legislation as unconstitutional are the following:

First. Because no act of Congress or decision of any court of last resort can be cited as a fair precedent.

Second. Because they say the bill attempts to accomplish indirectly that which can not be directly done under the commerce clause.

Third. That the measure constitutes an attempt to encroach upon the reserved rights of the States.

Fourth. That it violates the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Fifth. That it is not in fact and in law a regulation of commerce, but is a regulation of production, and therefore not within the power of Congress to enact.

NO EXACT PRECEDENT.

With reference to the first alleged ground of unconstitutionality, namely, that no exact precedent can be found in the acts of Congress or in the decisions of our courts of last resort for this legislation, and that, therefore, the proposed act is unconstitutional, I admit in part the premise, but contest its conclusion. It is true that Congress has not heretofore enacted a child-labor law, but it does not follow that Congress can not do so. The mere fact that Congress has not seen fit to exhaust the power to regulate commerce does not diminish in any degree the power itself.

It is a matter of legislative history that during the first 100 years following the adoption of our Federal Constitution Congress was slow to exercise the power to regulate commerce. It was not until 1887 that a comprehensive act under this power was passed. The basic antitrust act became law in 1890, and all safety appliance laws, employers' liability acts, and, indeed, nearly all important general legislation enacted by Congress under the commerce clause has come within the memory and experience of Senators still living. It may be, indeed I think it is true, that the far-reaching character of the power to regulate commerce was not appreciated by the general public and was not fully comprehended by some of the able lawyers in the early periods of our constitutional history. Certainly it was not invoked in every instance that it could have been employed. While the power to regulate commerce remains the same, in an abstract sense, as it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, nevertheless its application has been a subject of constant development, and the process is still going on.

The necessity for a centralized control over interstate and foreign commerce more than any other one factor brought about the adoption of our Federal Constitution. The annoyances and embarrassments to progress occasioned by regulations and burdens imposed on commerce by the several States was sufficient to revolutionize the Government and to substitute for the many sovereignties which prior to 1787 regulated commerce a single power—the Congress of the United States. From time to time Congress has gradually used this power wherever a national necessity for regulation has arisen or existed. It has not in any one act, nor in all the laws heretofore passed concerning commerce, exhausted its power, and it will not do so if this measure becomes law. As commerce grows in volume and its agencies and instrumentalities increase in number and complexity new conditions arising will give birth to new abuses justifying Congress to exert its power to promote the progress of our people through regulations of commerce. It is a feeble argument at best to say that because Congress has not heretofore passed a child-labor law it can not now or hereafter do so.

When the act to suppress lotteries was passed it was without precedent. The same is true of the antitrust law of 1890, the pure-food law, and the white-slave act. They were bitterly assailed on the ground of alleged unconstitutionality, yet they were all sustained. To say that because Congress has not heretofore exerted its power to suppress the evils of child-labor through a regulation of commerce and for that reason can not now do so is, in its last analysis, equivalent to maintaining that nothing can be done which has not already been done—a manifest fallacy approaching absurdity. Congress is daily passing new laws to meet changed conditions. That there are no exact precedents in the decisions of our courts is, of course, due to the fact that Congress has not heretofore passed a child-labor law, and the subject has not, therefore, come under direct consideration by the courts. There are decisions, however, which will be pointed out and discussed later, which in principle fairly seem to justify this legislation. It must be borne in mind that government in an administrative sense is a progressive science, else revolutions would be continual.

Second. The second objection urged by opponents to the constitutionality of this bill is that it is an attempt by Congress to suppress the evils of child labor; that Congress can not indirectly do this, since it has no authority to legislate upon the subject directly.

This argument is likewise based on a false assumption. Congress can indirectly do many things which it can not directly perform. By way of illustration, Congress suppressed lotteries by prohibiting and penalizing the transportation of lottery tickets in interstate commerce. Congress could not directly prohibit the raising of money by lotteries, but it denied to such business the facilities of commerce, and accomplished indirectly what it could not do directly. Numerous other illustrations may be cited. Congress can not directly prohibit the manufacture of adulterated foods or products, but it has in large part suppressed these evils by denying them the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. Congress can not directly prescribe how products shall be branded nor forbid their misbranding, but it can protect the public against the evils of misbranded goods by denying them transportation in interstate commerce. Congress can not prevent or penalize immoral acts in the several States, but it can diminish the traffic by penalizing the use of commercial arteries for the transportation of women in interstate commerce for immoral purposes.

In none of these cases was it the direct or controlling purpose on the part of Congress to increase or advance commerce, but in all of them the recognized purpose and effect was to suppress recognized evils by the indirect process of denying them the channels of commerce in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce. Further reference may again be made to some of the decisions of our Supreme Court in sustaining certain acts of commerce in which it has already exerted the power to regulate commerce in the interest of the public health, morals, safety, and welfare.

Third. The third contention that Federal child-labor legislation is an encroachment upon the reserved rights of the States has been seriously urged by many lawyers and laymen who are antagonistic to Federal legislation on this subject. This argument fails if the proposed act is in fact and law a regulation of commerce, for the tenth amendment provides that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

The power to regulate commerce has been delegated by the Constitution, and it is not, therefore, reserved to the States or to the people, and if this measure is within the reasonable exercise of the power to regulate commerce it is in nowise limited by the tenth amendment. In other words, if this legislation is by virtue of a power not delegated to the United States, then it is not a regulation of interstate commerce, for the power regulating interstate commerce is expressly delegated to the Congress.

On that subject I want to read what the Supreme Court of the United States said in Seven Cases against The United States, in volume 239, United States Reports, at page 514. The extract is brief. Mr. Justice Hughes, who is widely known—

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the title of the case?

Mr. ROBINSON. The title is Seven Cases against The United States, reported, as I have said, in volume 239, United States Reports. The particular language to which I now call attention is found on page 514:

So far it is objected that this measure, though relating to articles transported in interstate commerce, is an encroachment upon the reserved powers of the States, the objection is not to be distinguished in substance from that which was overruled in sustaining the white-slave act, chapter 395, June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 825); Hoke v. United States (227 U. S., 308). There, after stating that "if the facility of interstate transportation" can be denied in the case of lotteries, obscene literature, diseased cattle and persons, and impure food and drugs, the like facility could be taken away from "the systematic enticement of and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women," the court concluded with the reassertion of the simple principle that Congress is not to be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority over interstate commerce and its power to adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise because these means may have the quality of police regulations (227 U. S., pp. 322, 323). (See Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S., 196, 215; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S., 45, 57; Lottery Case, 188 U. S., 321.)

Fourth. The measure neither encroaches upon the reserved rights of the States, nor violates the fifth amendment, but is in fact and in law a regulation of commerce.

For convenience these three propositions will, from now on, be discussed together.

It may be well to bear in mind that from the leading case of Gibbon against Ogden, in Ninth Wheaton, decided in 1824, down to the Hope case (227 U. S.), decided in 1913, the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce has been held to be complete and exclusive, except as otherwise limited by the Constitution. Just how complete and absolute is this power is illustrated by the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Lottery cases (188 U. S., 353):

The power to regulate commerce among the several States is vested in Congress as absolute as it would be in a single Government having in its Constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

This language is intended to remove from the mind any confusion that might arise from a consideration of the dual form of our Government, and the conflicts which might exist between the powers of the two. In instances where a power has been delegated to the Federal Government that power is complete within itself and unlimited in so far as the State is concerned. The only limitations upon the power delegated to the Federal Government must be found in the Constitution itself. In this instance it is the fifth amendment, providing that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The Congress of the United States in regulating interstate commerce by acts partaking of the nature of police regulations is limited by this clause, and it is not otherwise limited. As already stated, it is not limited by the tenth amendment, for that relates to the powers "not delegated" and to the powers "reserved," and since we are dealing now with a delegated power, the tenth amendment can have imposed no limitation on the power of Congress to regulate commerce.

If the measure is a regulation of commerce, it would not be void as violating the fifth amendment unless an identical State law would also be void as violating the fourteenth amendment. The fifth amendment imposes on Federal legislation the same limitation that the fourteenth amendment places on State legislation. The fifth amendment denies the Federal Government the power to deprive any person of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law, while the fourteenth amendment denies any State the right to deprive any person of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. While the right to work is a property right, secured to the citizens against encroachment by the Federal Government through the fifth amendment and by the State government through the fourteenth amendment, child-labor laws enacted under the police powers of the several States have uniformly been recognized as reasonable and necessary for the health, comfort, and happiness of the beneficiaries of the legislation. A reasonable police regulation is not a violation of the fourteenth amendment and a reasonable regulation of commerce partaking of the quality of a police regulation is not a violation of the fifth amendment. A police regulation is not regarded unreasonable unless it is an arbitrary and oppressive interference with property rights, and it is reasonable and constitutional if justified by conditions concerning public health, safety, morals, or welfare. I therefore repeat the assertion that if a State law, enacted under the police power, does not violate the fourteenth amendment, a Federal law of the same provisions enacted under a Federal power would not violate the fifth amendment. It has always been held that the constitutional guaranty of life, liberty, and property under due process of law is subject to regulation in the interest of the public welfare.

Mr. President, as the hour for recess is approaching, I will suspend now and resume this discussion to-morrow.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in the earlier part of the day, in presenting an amendment to the District appropriation bill providing for a pension fund for the police and fire departments, I erroneously sent to the desk a draft that provided a pension fund for the firemen alone. I stated that it was the other amendment I desired to offer, and obtained from the Senate permission to print in the Record the views of the District Commissioners supporting the other amendment. Therefore I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and after that is carried I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and will then ask for the adoption of the amendment which should have been presented.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill has not been sent to the House, as I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; it has not. The chairman of the committee is present, and he and the committee well understand this action on my part and, I think, approve it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. We offer no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the votes whereby the amendments to House bill 15774 were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time and passed be reconsidered. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by me was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be taken. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this act the funds now authorized by law and known as the "police relief fund" and the "firemen's relief fund" shall be designated and known as the "policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia."

That the said fund shall consist of all fines imposed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon members of the police and fire departments of said District by way of discipline; all rewards, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be received by any member of said departments (for extraordinary services), except such part thereof as the said commissioners may allow to be retained by members of said departments; a deduction of 15 per cent of the monthly salary of each member of said departments; donations; and the net proceeds of sales of unclaimed property in the custody of the property clerk of the police department; all of which shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the "Policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia," herein provided for; and should the said fund at any time be insufficient to defray the expenditures hereinafter provided for, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in that event, are hereby authorized, and it shall be their duty, to direct the collector of taxes of said District and it shall be the duty of the said collector, pursuant to such direction, to pay into the Treasury of the United States, out of the general revenue of the District of Columbia collected by him, to the credit of the said "Policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia," such sums as may be necessary from time to time to meet deficiencies in said fund. The moneys to the credit of the said fund shall be available for expenditure on requisitions of the said commissioners for the purposes set forth in this act, and all expenditures from said fund shall be made and accounted for in the same manner as other expenditures of the government of the District of Columbia are made and accounted for.

That whenever any member of the police department or the fire department of the District of Columbia shall become temporarily disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the actual discharge of his duty, to such an extent as to require medical or surgical services other than such as can be rendered by the board of police and fire surgeons of said District, or to require hospital treatment, the expenses of such medical or surgical services, or hospital treatment, shall be paid from the policemen's and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, provided for in this act; but no such expenses shall be paid except upon a certificate of the said board of police and fire surgeons, or a member thereof, setting forth the necessity for such services or treatment and the nature of the injury or disease which rendered the same necessary, and upon the approval of the said certificate by the superintendent of the Metropolitan police or the chief engineer of the fire department, as the case may be, and the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

That whenever any member of the police department or the fire department of the District of Columbia shall become so permanently disabled through injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty as to incapacitate him for the performance of duty, or, having served not less than 25 years and having reached the age of 55 years shall, for any cause, become so permanently disabled as to incapacitate him for the performance of duty and shall make written application therefor and said application shall be approved by the commissioners of said District, or, having reached the age of 60 years in the discretion of the said commissioners, he shall in either event be retired from the service thereof and be entitled to receive relief from the said policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, in an amount not to exceed 50 per cent per year of the salary received by him at the date of retirement. In case of the death of any member of the police department or the fire department of the District of Columbia, before or after retirement from the service thereof, leaving a widow, or a child, or children under 16 years of age, the widow shall be entitled to receive relief from the said policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, in an amount not exceeding $35 per month, and each child under the age of 16 years in an amount not exceeding $10 per month, and in no case shall the amount paid to any one family exceed the sum of $50 per month: Provided, That upon the remarriage of any widow granted relief under the provisions of this act such relief shall cease, and relief granted to or for any child or children under the age of 16 years shall cease upon their reaching that age: Provided further, That no widow, child, or children of any deceased member of the said police department or fire department resulting from any marriage contracted subsequent to the date of retirement of such member shall be entitled to any relief under the provisions of this act.

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to pay from the said policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, a sum not exceeding $75 in any one case to defray the funeral expenses of any deceased member of the police department or the fire department of said District dying while in the service thereof or following retirement therefrom with relief.

That there is hereby created in and for the District of Columbia a board to be known as the police and firemen's retiring and relief board, to be composed of the corporation counsel of said District or one of his assistants, to be designated by the Commissioners of the District, and one member from each the police department and fire department, to be designated by the said commissioners, and the said commissioners are authorized to change the personnel of said board from time to time, in their discretion, and they are further authorized and empowered to make, modify, and to amend from time to time regulations and rules of procedure for the conduct of the said board. The said board shall consider all cases for the retirement and relief of members of the police department and the fire department rendered necessary or expedient under the provisions of this act, and all applications for the relief of widows and children under 16 years of age. In every case of retirement of a member of either of said departments the board of police and fire surgeons shall certify, in writing, to the said retiring and relief board the physical condition of the member for whom retirement and relief is sought. The said retiring and relief board shall give written notice to any member of said departments under consideration by it for retirement and relief to appear before the board and give such evidence under oath as he may desire, and the proceedings of the board shall be reduced to writing and shall show the date of appointment of such member, his age, his record in the service, and any other information that may be pertinent to the matter of his retirement and relief. The said board is authorized and empowered to summon any person before it to give testimony, under oath or affirmation, as to any matter affecting retirement and relief under the provisions of this act; and any member of the board shall have power to administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the said board. Such summons shall be served by any member of the Metropolitan police force, and upon the refusal or neglect of a witness to appear before the said board or to testify when required, he or she may be compelled to attend and testify as provided in the act of February 20, 1896, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved May 11, 1892," and any witness knowingly making a false statement to the said board on any material matter shall be guilty of perjury and punishable accordingly. The said retiring and relief board shall in each case considered by it for retirement and relief submit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a report of its findings, and the said commissioners shall have power to approve, disapprove, or modify such findings or to remand any case for such further proceedings as they may deem necessary.

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in their discretion and at any time, may cause any person receiving any relief allowance under the provisions of this act, who has served less than 25 years, to appear and undergo a medical examination, as the result of which the said commissioners shall determine whether the relief in such case shall be continued, increased, decreased, or discontinued. Should any person receiving relief under the provisions of this act, after due notice, fail to appear and undergo the examination prescribed here, the said commissioners are authorized, in their discretion, to reduce or entirely discontinue such relief.

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, reduce or discontinue the relief granted to any person under the provisions of this act upon receipt of duly certified information from a court of competent jurisdiction that any person receiving such relief has been convicted in such court of any crime involving moral turpitude; and the said commissioners may also, in their discretion, reduce or discontinue the relief granted to any person under the provisions of this act when it shall appear to their satisfaction from evidence before them that such person is a habitual drunkard or guilty of lewd or lascivious conduct.

That any retired member of the police department or fire department of the District of Columbia receiving relief under the provisions of this act may in time of flood, riot, conflagration, during extraordinary assemblages, or unusual emergencies be called by the commissioners of said District into the service of the department from which he was retired with relief for such duty as his disability will permit of him performing, without compensation therefor; and the said commissioners shall have power to enforce compliance with the provisions hereof by withholding the payment of relief; but nothing contained in this section shall be construed to enforce residence in the District of Columbia upon any retired member of either of said departments when it shall appear to the satisfaction of said commissioners that residence elsewhere is rendered necessary by the physical condition of such member.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

LANDS AT PORT ANGELES, WASH.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I ask leave to submit a favorable report from the Committee on Public Lands, and I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to it.

From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 6561) providing for the sale at public auction of all unsold suburban lots not reserved for public purposes in the Government town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and for the issuance of patents for those previously sold under the act of May 6, 1906, on the payment of the price at which the said lots were reappraised under said act without further condition or delay.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if this is an emergency matter?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is an emergency matter. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 8, after the word "May," to strike out "sixth" and insert "second"; on page 2, line 2, to strike out "sixth" and insert "second"; in line 6, to strike out "sixth" and insert "second"; in line 9, to strike out "sixth" and insert "second"; and in line 12, to strike out "sixth" and insert "second," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell at public auction to the highest bidder all unsold suburban lots not reserved for public purposes in the Government town site of Port Angeles, Wash., at not less than the value at which they were reappraised under the act of May 2, 1906.

Sec. 2. That as to all suburban lots of said town site heretofore sold under the act of May 2, 1906, or previous acts, patents for the said lots shall be issued to each purchaser upon payment in full by said purchaser or claimant of the reappraised price of such lot or lots as returned under the act of May 2, 1906, irrespective of whether such purchaser shall have improved said lot to the value of $300, as required by said act of May 2, 1906.

Sec. 3. That all acts or parts of acts relating to said lots in conflict herewith, and particularly that part of the act of May 2, 1906, stipulating improvements to the value of $300 required to be made upon each such suburban lot prior to the issuance of patent, are hereby repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the sale at public auction of all unsold suburban lots not reserved for public purposes in the Government town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and for the issuance of patents for those previously sold under the act of May 2, 1906, on the payment of the price of which the said lots were reappraised under said act without further condition or delay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on public business and that he is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

I wish also to state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is detained at his home by illness.

CHILD LABOR.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, on yesterday I attempted to explain the provisions of the Senate committee substitute and to compare them with the bill as passed by the House, and also to point out what appear to be improvements made by the Senate substitute in the pending legislation. An effort was also made to discuss some of the reasons or grounds justifying Federal child-labor legislation. I presented some views concerning the constitutionality of the proposed bill, and at the time when the Senate recessed I was contending that the pending bill does not violate the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and had pointed out that the fifth amendment imposes the same limitations on Federal action, and no more, that the fourteenth amendment places on State action, and that if it is competent for a State, in the exercise of its police powers, to pass a child-labor law it is within the authority of Congress through a regulation of commerce, in the nature of a police regulation, to aid in suppressing the evils of child labor by denying to persons and enterprises engaged in such abuses the channels and instrumentalities of commerce. I had just pointed out the fact that the only limitation on such regulations is that they must be reasonable and not arbitrary.

The scope of the police power has never been completely defined, but seems to be expanding rather than contracting under the decisions of our courts.

In Chicago Railway Co. v. McGuire (219 U. S., 567), the court said:

Liberty implies the absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions in the interests of the community.

Further illustrating the extent of the police power, it was said in McLean v. Arkansas (211 U. S., 539):

The mere fact that a court may differ with the legislature in its views of public policy, or the judges may hold views inconsistent with the propriety of the legislation in question, affords no ground for judicial interference, unless the act enacted is unquestionably and palpably in excess of the legislative power.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce, being absolute and unlimited, except as provided by the Constitution itself, and the only limitation in the Constitution as to this legislation being the fifth amendment, it becomes a question whether this legislation would constitute a deprivation of the property of a citizen without due process of law. It appearing that reasonable regulations are not violative of the due-process clause, the final question to be determined is whether this is a reasonable or arbitrary regulation.

In support of this position I read what the Supreme Court of the United States has said in the Lottery Cases (188 U. S., p. 354). First, reading from page 353, the court uses this language:

They—

Meaning the cases already referred to—

They also show that the power to regulate commerce among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States; that such power is plenary, complete in itself, and may be exerted by Congress to its utmost extent, subject only to such limitations as the Constitution imposes upon the exercise of the powers granted by it; and that in determining the character of the regulations to be adopted Congress has a large discretion which is not to be controlled by the courts, simply because, in their opinion, such regulations may not be the best or most effective that could be employed.

Again, on page 354, there is this language:

But it is said that the statute in question does not regulate the carrying of lottery tickets from State to State, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress in effect prohibits such carrying; that in respect of the carrying from one State to another of articles or things that are, in fact, or according to usage in business, the subjects of commerce, the authority given Congress was not to prohibit, but only to regulate. This view was earnestly pressed at the bar by learned counsel, and must be examined.

It is to be remarked that the Constitution does not define what is to be deemed a legitimate regulation of interstate commerce. In Gibbons v. Ogden it was said that the power to regulate such commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which it is to be governed. But this general observation leaves it to be determined, when the question comes before the court, whether Congress in prescribing a particular rule has exceeded its power under the Constitution. While our Government must be acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers, McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316, 405, 407), the Constitution does not attempt to set forth all the means by which such powers may be carried into execution. It leaves to Congress a large discretion as to the means that may be employed in executing a given power. The sound construction of the Constitution, this court has said: "must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." (4 Wheat., 421.)

We have said that the carrying from State to State of lottery tickets constitutes interstate commerce, and that the regulation of such commerce is within the power of Congress under the Constitution. Are we prepared to say that a provision which is, in effect, a prohibition of the carriage of such articles from State to State is not a fit or appropriate mode for the regulation of that particular kind of commerce? If lottery traffic, carried on through interstate commerce, is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic, and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all the States, and under the power to regulate interstate commerce, devise such means within the scope of the Constitution, and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States?

On page 356 I find this language:

If a State, when considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits, may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money, in that mode, why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another? In this connection it must not be forgotten that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States is plenary, is complete in itself, and is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution. What provision in that instrument can be regarded as limiting the exercise of the power granted? What clause can be cited which, in any degree, countenances the suggestion that one may, of right, carry or cause to be carried from one State to another that which will harm the public morals? We can not think of any clause of that instrument that could possibly be invoked by those who assert their right to send lottery tickets from State to State except the one providing that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. We have said that the liberty protected by the Constitution embraces the right to be free in the enjoyment of one's faculties; "to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts that may be proper." (Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S., 578, 589.) But surely it will not be said to be a part of any one's liberty, as recognized by the supreme law of the land, that he shall be allowed to introduce into commerce among the States an element that will be confessedly injurious to the public morals.

If it be said that the act of 1895 is inconsistent with the tenth amendment, reserving to the States, respectively, or to the people the powers not delegated to the United States, the answer is that the power to regulate commerce among the States has been expressly delegated to Congress.

Besides Congress by that act does not assume to interfere with traffic or commerce in lottery tickets carried on exclusively within the limits of any State, but has in view only commerce of that kind among the several States. It has not assumed to interfere with the completely internal affairs of any State, and has only legislated in respect of a matter which concerns the people of the United States. As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the "widespread pestilence of lotteries" and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets as carried on through interstate commerce Congress only supplemented the action of those States—perhaps all of them—which for the protection of the public morals prohibit the drawing of lotteries as well as the sale or circulation of lottery tickets within their respective limits.

On page 358 is found this language:

If the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another be interstate commerce, and if Congress is of opinion that an effective regulation for the suppression of lotteries carried on through such commerce is to make it a criminal offense to cause lottery tickets to be carried from one State to another, we know of no authority in the courts to hold that the means thus devised are not appropriate and necessary to protect the country at large against a species of interstate commerce which, although in general use and somewhat favored in both national and State legislation in the early history of the country, has grown into disrepute and has become offensive to the entire people of the Nation. It is a kind of traffic which no one can be entitled to pursue as of right.

In the Hoke case (227 U. S., 319), sustaining the so-called white-slave act, the Supreme Court held a statute enacted by Congress under the power to regulate commerce forbidding the interstate transportation of women for immoral purposes a valid exercise of the power, and that it partakes of the quality of a police regulation. In the lottery cases, the Congress used its power to regulate commerce to protect the public against raising money in the States by the sale of lottery tickets, which had come to be regarded as a form of gambling. The real purpose was to suppress lotteries, and it was accomplished through a regulation of commerce in the nature of a police regulation.

In the Hoke case the instrumentalities of commerce were denied to suppress or diminish immorality. In view of these decisions Congress can aid in removing the evils of child labor by denying the instrumentalities of commerce to those who employ children in such ways and under such conditions as to constitute a public evil or menace.

In the Hoke case Mr. Justice McKenna said:

It may be that Congress could not prohibit the manufacture of the article in a State. It may be that Congress could not prohibit in all of its conditions its sale within a State. But Congress may prohibit its transportation between the States, and by that means defeat the motive and evils of its manufacture (227 U. S., 322).

These cases support the doctrine that the power of Congress to regulate commerce extends to the denial of the channels of interstate commerce for use by an enterprise which is so operated as to be detrimental to the public health or morals, and, therefore, Congress has the power to deny the channels of interstate commerce to a person or establishment in which objectionable child labor is employed.

It is said by some who oppose this bill that the power of Congress to exclude articles from commerce is limited to such articles as are themselves detrimental to commerce. But this conclusion is not supported by the plain doctrine of the Lottery cases and the Hoke case. On the contrary, the doctrine of these cases seems to be that the power of Congress to regulate commerce may be exerted in the interest of the health, morals, and safety of the public.

There can be no distinction in law between a regulation of commerce partaking of the quality of a police regulation intended to suppress an evil after the commerce is completely terminated, and another designed to suppress an evil before that commerce begins, provided the end to be accomplished is obtained through a regulation of commerce.

Congress has no more direct control over an article after it has passed out of commerce into the general property of the State than before it has entered that commerce. It has an equal right to use its regulatory power to suppress evils concerning the manufacture of an article as it has to protect the public from the dangers growing out of its wrongful use after commerce in that article has terminated.

This bill is clearly a regulation of commerce. That it partakes of the quality of a police regulation does not in any wise impair its validity. The effect of this measure is to suppress conditions which Congress regards as evil concerning the employment of children in the State by denying to persons and enterprises employing proscribed child labor the instrumentalities of commerce. It seems, therefore, clearly within the power of Congress to enact.

Summarizing this argument supporting the constitutionality of the bill, the power of Congress to regulate commerce is complete and absolute, except as limited by the Constitution itself. This power is as absolute in Congress as it would be in a single Government having in its constitution the same limitations to exercise power as are contained in the Constitution of the United States. The only limitation in the Federal Constitution on the power of Congress to regulate commerce, in so far as this bill is concerned, is the fifth amendment, which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The fifth amendment imposes the same limitation on the Federal authority as that placed by the fourteenth amendment on State action, and no more. Therefore, if the States, in the exercise of the police power, can suppress the evils of child labor, Congress, through its power to regulate commerce, can promote the same end by denying the channels and instrumentalities of commerce to persons and enterprises so employing child labor as to constitute an evil detrimental to the public health, morals, and safety. Congress can indirectly accomplish a great many things that it can not directly perform, as is well illustrated by the Lottery cases, the White Slave cases, the so-called Seven cases, and many other decisions of the United States Supreme Court affirming the power of Congress to enact legislation partaking of the quality of police regulations in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce. The tenth amendment, providing that the powers not delegated by the Constitution to the Federal Government are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people, has no application, since the power to regulate commerce is a delegated power, and not a reserved power. The tenth amendment can have no application to delegated powers. It relates solely to reserved rights.

The power to regulate commerce being a delegated power, is in nowise limited by the tenth amendment. Congress has as much power to suppress recognized evils in conditions surrounding the production or manufacture through a regulation of commerce as it has to suppress the same after transportation has ended. While the constitutionality of this bill is not conclusively demonstrable, its provisions are fairly within the principles laid down in the Lottery cases and the Hoke case, and it is for these reasons a valid exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, partaking of the quality of a police regulation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should suggest to him something that is troubling my mind in connection with this measure?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not at all. I should be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WORKS. I think there is no doubt of the power of Congress to deal with interstate commerce in any form, but the question that troubles me in this matter is whether or not this is an interstate matter. I can understand very well why the power of Congress should be extended to the distribution over the country of lottery tickets, because the evil is just as great in the State to which they are carried as it is in the State from which they are sent; but that is not true respecting the manufacture of goods that are not hurtful in themselves. The transportation of them is not harmful and the use of them in other States is not detrimental to the interests of those States; neither is the actual transportation of them from one State to another. The evil here is strictly and solely within a State; that is to say, the use of children in the manufacture of goods. It does not extend to other States; it does not extend to transportation itself from one State to another. Therefore, the question in my mind is, whether it is interstate commerce that is being dealt with in this kind of legislation. I say, with all deference, that I think the Lottery cases do not reach this question, for the reason I have suggested, and it is a very troublesome question to my mind. I am in entire sympathy with this legislation if it is going to accomplish what is intended, but I must say that I have very grave doubt about the constitutionality of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in the beginning of my argument I pointed out the fact that there is no exact precedent in the legislation of this country for this bill, and for that reason there is no exact precedent in the decisions of the courts; but throughout my argument it is contended that, under the principle of the lottery cases and the Hoke case, this legislation is within the power of Congress.

The Senator from California has said that he can readily see that a lottery ticket is detrimental to commerce itself, and that it is detrimental to every State through which it is carried, and therefore it would be within the regulative power of Congress. Mr. President, a lottery ticket as such can do no harm to commerce.

It was not the purpose of Congress in enacting the lottery act of 1895 to protect commerce from lotteries. The primary purpose was to suppress an evil within the States, to protect the public against the "widespread pestilence of lotteries." What harm, I ask the Senator from California, can the shipment of a package of lottery tickets do to commerce? The harm is done after the lottery tickets are delivered in a State and when the gambling transactions occur.

Mr. WORKS. Well, Mr. President, it is not so much a question of the injury that results from the mere act of transportation. I think the Senator is right about that; but the trouble about it is, and the distinction between that and the case before the Senate is, that you are carrying an evil into another State, which the other State is not able to keep out, as is suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is also true that if Congress can exercise its power to regulate commerce in the interest of public health, safety, and morals, it makes no difference whether the result is to be accomplished before the commerce begins or after it ends.

Mr. WORKS. That is very true; but has Congress the right to deal with any particular matter as affecting the public health, unless it is something that does affect the health of another State, either after it leaves the State of origin or in passing from one State to another?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I have discussed that subject very fully during the course of my remarks.

Mr. WORKS. I am very sorry that I did not hear what the Senator said on yesterday. I did not know that this measure was coming up, but I am very much interested in it, and I am very glad to hear what the Senator is saying about it now.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have discussed that subject very fully during the course of my remarks, and I was just in the act of concluding what I have to say upon the bill when the Senator from California interrupted me. I think it would be something of an imposition on the Senate to repeat my argument in that particular, so I will merely conclude it by saying that there is no distinction in law between the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce to suppress evils in a State before the commerce begins and the exercise of the power for the same purpose after the commerce ends. The principle is the same.

Mr. WORKS. I certainly should not ask the Senator to repeat anything for my benefit which he has already said. I can read what the Senator has said, but these matters suggested themselves to my mind. I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have said that the question is not conclusively demonstrable. It is a great and very important question. In view of the history of the commerce clause and considering the trend of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, this bill seems to be within the power of Congress to enact in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce, and I believe it will be so held by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he sits down as to the bill itself, and not as to its constitutional features?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The substitute for the House bill, reported by the Senate committee, beginning on page 5, line 8, commences as follows:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity the product of any mine or quarry, situated in the United States, in which within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom—

I ask the Senator's attention to the words "prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom." Suppose a case arises where the product of a factory is taken to a warehouse and kept in a warehouse for 30 days, or 60 days, or 90 days, how, then, under this bill, could there be any enforcement of its provisions?

Mr. ROBINSON. The factory from which the goods were sent would have to suspend the employment of objectionable child labor in order to escape the penalties of the statute.

Mr. KENYON. If the particular product, then, should be taken from the warehouse and delivered to the carrier, could not the law be absolutely evaded in that way?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I think not. That question was fully considered by the committee. It could be evaded if a manufacturing establishment ceased its operations at a given time; but the provision is continuing, and the manufacturer would have to suspend the employment of the child labor in order to continue his operations or become liable to the penalties.

Mr. KENYON. Even from a warehouse?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I did not know but that the bill would be strengthened by some proviso to the effect that removal to a warehouse or to any other separate establishment, should be accounted as a delivery under the terms of the bill, or something of that character. I am afraid there is a little weakness there.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think perhaps there would be no objection to such an amendment, but, of course, before I undertake to determine this I would have to see the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I will now conclude what I have to say upon this subject.

It is to be hoped that the Congress may speedily complete its labors and adjourn. Many important matters remain undisposed of for consideration by the Senate. It is now universally conceded that the pending bill will pass by an overwhelming majority. The measure will be fully discussed. There ought not to be any unnecessary delay in reaching a final conclusion here concerning this important subject. The demand for the legislation seems to be quite general. It is a part of the forward movement in American social and industrial conditions, and no power can stay its advance.

I thank my colleagues for the very courteous interest they have manifested in my views.

Mr. HARDWICK obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to offer a proposed amendment, which I ask to have read, printed, and lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 24, after the word "meridian," it is proposed to strike out the colon and insert a comma and the following words:

Or any article or commodity the product of any farm which is the material for the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment in the United States upon which children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work or children between the ages of 14 and 16 years have been employed or permitted to work more than 11 hours a day.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if every Senator who is now in the Chamber had heard all of the remarks of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], or if every person who shall read the remarks that I intend to make would also read those remarks, I would not at this stage of my remarks on this bill repeat some things that the Senator had said about the provisions of this bill as passed by the House of Representatives and as recommended by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 8234) provides, in substance—

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 16 years, or the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years who work more than 8 hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m.

I shall not read the other provisions of the House bill. The substance of the proposition of the House is embraced in the language I have just read to the Senate.

As a substitute for that the Senate committee proposes the following:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity the product of any mine or quarry, situated in the United States, in which within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom children under the age of 16 years have been employed or permitted to work, or any article or commodity the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, situated in the United States, in which within 30 days prior to the removal of such product therefrom children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 6 o'clock a. m.—

And so on, repeating the same terms as to the ages of the children and as to the hours and conditions of labor that are carried in the House bill.

Mr. President, I advert to this difference at this preliminary stage of my remarks to show one thing, and one thing only, for the present. Under the House bill the specific and particular product of child labor was prohibited from interstate commerce, whereas under the Senate amendment not only the product of child labor—the prohibition of which Senators seek to justify on moral grounds—is prohibited but also any product produced by any man or corporation who does not live up to a rule of civil conduct on this subject laid down by the Congress of the United States. In other words, while the subterfuge was so plain as to be not only demonstrable but demonstrated in the provisions of the House bill, in the Senate bill even subterfuge is disregarded and cast aside; for the Senate amendment not only undertakes to prohibit from entrance into the channels of interstate commerce the products of that labor which you make unlawful by this bill, but we also undertake to prohibit, in equal manner and in exactly the same terms, every other product of a man who violates the rule of civil conduct that we have established in each State of this Republic, through the agency of Congress, because he does not live up to that rule.

Now, let us see what that means. Probably I can make it plainer to the Senate by giving a practical illustration. There are many of these manufacturing establishments that have many different departments. It might be that some of them, we will say for the purpose of illustration, have 20 different departments, and it is easily conceivable that in only one of these departments is child labor as prohibited under the terms of this bill employed; and yet under the terms of the Senate committee's amendment the product of every one of the other 19 departments, in which no child had ever labored, made by a labor upon which no child of any age had ever been employed, would be in equal manner and by the very same identical terms of the proposed statute equally prohibited from entering into interstate commerce.

As I shall point out later, Mr. President, the phraseology of this proposition, both of the House and of the Senate, was taken from the lottery statute; not with respect to the point I raise, however. In the lottery statute it was provided simply that any person who offered to send through the channels of interstate commerce, or, my recollection is, through the Post Office Department, any lottery ticket—confining it strictly and solely to lottery tickets—should be guilty of a penal offense under the statutes of the United States.

To illustrate: Even under the principles of the lottery case, if a man ran a printing shop and printed lottery tickets that were part and parcel of a gambling transaction, under the House bill on this subject and under the statute that Congress passed and which was upheld by the courts, the only thing you could prohibit from entrance into the channels of interstate commerce was the lottery ticket itself; and if he produced a dozen other kinds of legitimate printing, such other legitimate products of that printing shop could not be denied entrance into the channels of interstate commerce.

Therefore I say this proposition of the Senate committee not only goes far beyond the proposition of the House of Representatives but far beyond the proposition of the Congress and of the Supreme Court in the Lottery case, because there, as in the House bill, nothing was penalized except the immoral thing itself. Nothing was penalized except the particular product of a man's business that was under the ban of the law. Here everything he produces is penalized, lawful and unlawful, even according to the standards you seek to set up in this bill; and if 90 per cent of the employees of a person subject to the provisions of this law were engaged in different departments of manufacture, utterly disconnected with some department in which a few children were employed, you would penalize him and outlaw his whole legitimate product—legitimate even according to the standards you set up in this legislation.

I expect to advert to that matter later during the course of this argument; but I make the prediction here and now, and I measure my words when I make it, that when this matter gets to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is bound to be settled, in that great forum you will encounter insuperable objection of a constitutional nature in the form of this Senate amendment itself, from the way in which you have mixed in inextricable confusion things that are legitimate and lawful, even under the standard that you now set up, with things that are unlawful according to that standard.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the provision which he is now discussing does not prove beyond any doubt that the object of this legislation is not to prevent interstate commerce in certain products, but to prevent the employment of children within a State?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly. As I have just said to the Senate, here all pretense is cast to the four winds of heaven. The House of Representatives did preserve a little pretense, so small that it was almost disgraceful; but here you cast it every bit to the winds, and you have said: "We are not seeking simply to bar the products of child labor from the channels of interstate commerce. We are not seeking to prohibit the product of child labor, and of child labor alone, from entering the channels of interstate commerce, but we are going to fine or put in jail the man who does not live up to the rule of civil conduct that we prescribe for 48 States of this Union by act of Congress on a purely domestic and internal affair."

Mr. President, I do not wish to be misunderstood, so far as my attitude about this bill is concerned. I am as thoroughly, as earnestly, as sincerely in favor of the enactment of just and humane and reasonable laws for the protection of children as any man on either side of this Chamber can possibly be; but because we want a certain kind of a law, does that confer upon the Congress of the United States any warrant to establish it about a purely domestic and internal affair? The same argument might be applied, the same desire for uniformity might be urged, as to any kind of a civil or criminal statute which we sought to set up throughout the Union and to enforce uniformly and impartially in all the States of the Republic. I favor the most just and the most humane legislation on this subject that enlightened men, with the fear of God and the love of their fellow men in their hearts, can enact. But I say to you in all soberness and in all earnestness that the sole power to enact those laws resides in the legislative authorities of the several States of this Union and not in the Congress of the United States.

I venture the assertion that the great Commonwealth in which I reside has a child-labor law that is better, fairer, more just, more suited to our conditions, and more thoroughly satisfactory to our people than the standard you propose to set up in this bill. I not only am willing to yield to interruptions on that subject, but I invite contradiction, if any Senator on this floor can make it.

Now, I will state what those laws are, and I will leave it to those Senators present to say whether we have not a better law than you propose for the whole United States in this bill.

In our State—I have the act of 1914 before me—the hours of employment are practically the same as those provided in this bill. I will not read it unless some controversy arises about it. They are practically the same as they are in this bill. We have no mines or quarries that amount to anything in our States, so that part of the bill is a negligible, if not an entirely unimportant, matter there. There children are not allowed to work in factories under the age of 14, just as this bill proposes, excepting in two instances; and what are they?—because these two exceptions constitute the difference between the proposed Federal law and the Georgia statute. There children who are under 14 and between the ages of 12 and 14, can work, first, if they are the sole support of a widowed mother. Is not that better than this bill? Up to 14, under the law you propose for the United States, a child, a good, sturdy boy, after he gets to be 12 or 13 years old and before he arrives at the age of 14, is not allowed to toil honestly for the mother that bore him, although she is destitute and would otherwise be an object of charity.

You do not provide anything in this bill for either the child or the mother. If you are not going to let him work, if you are not going to let him support his mother, in the name of God and that humanity which is so often appealed to here, why not carry it out and give his starving mother a crust of bread.

There is one other difference between the Georgia statute and this proposed law. There a child between the age of 12 and 14 years is allowed to work if he is an orphan, if he has no other means of support, and the sole alternative is he must either work or be an object of public charity. In the name of American boys everywhere, not born with silver spoons in their mouths, in the name of the poor boys, would you rather send them to the poorhouse to receive public alms than to let them work and win their bread in honest toil?

I tell you now and here the statute of Georgia is better and wiser and more just and more humane on this great subject than that you prate so much about than the law that you propose as a panacea for all these evils.

Mr. President, there are four great groups that support this bill and that give it that enormous political power which we have seen manifested in the other House of Congress and which is soon to make itself manifested on this floor, I am sorry to say. What are these groups? First, the sentimentalists everywhere, people like my good friend from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and I honor him for his motives. I honor every one of those good men in and out of Congress. I know they mean to do right.

Ah, Mr. President, it is not the first wrong that has been done in this country in the name of a misinformed and misguided humanitarian spirit. My own judgment is that many years ago a spirit like this manifested itself on the great race question, on the slavery question, and swept the public so far from the moorings of reasonable, sober, and calm judgment and of just, well-considered appropriate action that it plunged this country into the most horrible war the world had ever seen up to that time, and drenched our soil in blood. I refer to William Lloyd Garrison, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and people of that kind and type everywhere throughout this Republic, godly men and godly women, I admit. The time has come at last when everywhere in this Republic justice can be done to them and their motives even though we deplore some of their rash and precipitate words and deeds. Ah, if in those days this country could have listened to men of sober, sturdy, well-balanced judgment like our great martyred President, Abraham Lincoln, men of that class and type throughout the country, of all parties and of all sections, we would have been saved a world of trouble.

Now, I have paid my tribute to these humanitarians for their motives. I have the highest respect for their motives, but for their judgment I have very little.

I want to ask them to-day throughout this country, in the United States and out of it, what they propose to do with a child who is the sole support of his widowed mother, when they take from him his opportunity to work; what substitute are they going to give? Are you going to let them both—mother and child—starve, or become objects of public charity? I want to ask people in the United States, and out of it, what they are going to say to the honest, self-respecting orphan boy, 12 or 13 years old, born on Georgia soil, when they say to him, "You shall not work," even if the alternative is public charity? And what is the substitute that you offer?

Senators, I tell you, some of the greatest men this Republic ever produced, in my State and in each one of yours, were boys like that. Are you going to make them inmates of charitable institutions and support them at the expense of the State?

I tell you in the name of American institutions, in the name of individualism in this Republic, it would be better to let them adopt the other plan that our fathers and theirs followed; honest, self-respecting toil is far more elevating than either public or private charity.

Mr. President, there is still another of these great groups that make up the political strength of this movement, to which I now wish to allude. It is union labor. It is hardly necessary for me to say on this floor, and it is certainly entirely unnecessary for me to say to the people of my State, that I was born with no silver spoon in my mouth. I have the greatest sympathy on earth—I yield to no Senator on this floor in that respect—for a man who toils with his hands and earns the bread that God ordained he should earn “in the sweat of his brow.” But I do not hesitate to say for one, be the result what it will, I am utterly unwilling to support union labor or its leaders whenever they want something that I know is wrong and will work injury upon my people and upon the Republic. I am willing to stand by them when they are right, but that is as far as they ought to ask anybody to go, and that is as far as any good man ought to go with them, or with anybody else.

Because I sympathize with them so deeply, because I put manhood so far above everything else, I am always willing to give them the benefit of every doubt, where there is a doubt, but the fact is that union labor, North, East, South, and West, has made this measure one of its demands, and we, in this Chamber, are about to register a decree of acquiescence, just as it was registered in the other House of Congress not so many months ago, regardless of the Constitution, regardless of our fundamental principles of Government, regardless of everything else except the votes to be cast in November next.

There is another great factor in the great allied forces that make up the support of this bill. It is commercial rivalry between the manufacturing institutions of the different States and different sections of this Republic. Some of them believe that their competitors in other States have more favorable labor conditions and cheaper labor than they are able to get in their own States. Hence they want this bill to make it uniform, as my friend, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], asserts.

Now, gentlemen, the complaint in this question is leveled at the southern portion of this Republic. Why I do not know, because on this floor yesterday the Senator who championed this bill, who presented it for the committee, when asked to specify the States that were absolutely deficient in this regard, from his own standpoint, from his own standard, according to his own judgment, named one Southern State, North Carolina, and two Western States, Wyoming and New Mexico.

The reason why the opposition to this legislation comes from the Southern States of this Republic is not because of the suggestion which has been made, and the innuendo indulged in on this floor and elsewhere, that great and powerful manufacturers there are opposed to it. That is not the primary reason, in my judgment.

I know that I do not have to make any such statement, but I am glad to have this opportunity to do so. Not one of those men, in all my life, ever said a word to me upon this subject. After I announced years ago my unalterable opposition to this sort of legislation on constitutional grounds and for reasons that are fundamental, certain gentlemen who have opposed this bill have written to me thanking me for what they called my sound position on this question. Not one of them has sought to influence me or my attitude or my vote on this great question.

The suggestion that a strong, rich, grasping, powerful, insidious lobby is responsible for the opposition to this bill, or for the opposition of individual Senators to this bill, is utterly false, and is beneath the contempt of every honest man.

Talk about lobbyists. I will tell you right now there is a good deal of loose talk in the country on that subject. People have to come here to tell Congress when their interests are affected. When they do it honorably, in a public way, there is no objection to it; on the contrary, there is every reason why they should do so, both to protect themselves from injustice and the Congress from mistakes.

Speaking of lobbyists on this question, I believe that the interests which favor the passage of this bill have maintained for years one of the strongest and most successful lobbies ever maintained in Washington in support of a legislative proposition. Yet I want to say here and now that I do not believe that the gentlemen who constitute that lobby have ever sought to approach any Senator of the United States or any Representative in the Congress of the United States in anything but a perfectly proper and legitimate way, to make legitimate and proper arguments that appealed to them on this question.

Another great force that supports this bill is commercial rivalry between the different States and sections of the country. Ah, gentlemen, it has already done more harm in this great country than any other one solitary force. It came pretty near tearing this Union into discordant and disordered fragments long before the great Civil War. The chief reason why we had to form this great Constitution of ours was to defend against its selfishness and its greed.

Then there is another great motive power that supports this bill. What is that? It is the intense political rivalry of both the great political parties in their courtship of the Bull Moose or Progressive forces, and an earnest, sustained, headlong purpose to get their votes at almost any price.

This measure is no Democratic doctrine. My brethren, do not fool yourselves about that. If you support it, if you sustain it, if you embrace it, you will be the first Democrats of any important position in all the history of the Republic who ever did so.

My friends on the Republican side, it was not until very recently that you supported it. If you embrace it, if you commit yourselves to it, you will be the first Republicans of respectable position who ever did such a thing.

There is one solitary exception, and that is the distinguished ex-Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge. I sat in a seat on this floor during most of the time of his presentation of this question in 1907, when he announced the startling proposition, astounding and shocking to me, that the Congress of the United States has absolute power—I am sorry my friend from Arkansas, a southern Democrat, seems to agree with him—that Congress has the absolute power to exclude from the channels of interstate commerce in the country any article for any reason whatever that to it seems to be good.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely want to say that if the Senator construes my remarks to indicate that I assumed that position he has misinterpreted them—

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to have the Senator explain it.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I have been exceedingly unfortunate in not clearly expressing myself, for I know that the Senator from Georgia usually understands the positions of Senators when he hears them discussed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am delighted to hear the Senator from Arkansas make even that much of a disclaimer. I am glad to know that he does not stand where Beveridge stood in 1907, when he stood in his place on this floor and advocated this proposition in almost the words I have stated. He said that it was within the power of the Congress of the United States to exclude from interstate commerce any article or commodity that it pleased for any reason that seemed to it good and sound.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Arkansas made no such statement. That question, in my opinion, is not directly involved.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not directly involved?

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought I made clear my position upon that question. I repeated it several times, and if the Senator will permit me I will state it again.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did assert the power of Congress, through its power to regulate commerce, to legislate in the interest of the health, safety, and morals of the people, but that a police regulation rests in the States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Congress is the judge? I am going to see where your doctrine leads. I do not want to do the Senator an injustice. I do not wonder that he disclaims the impression I have had of his speech; I am glad he has done it; but let us see where his present position leads. Let us see who is the judge.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is a question for final determination by the court.

Mr. HARDWICK. But for Congress primarily.

Mr. ROBINSON. Congress determines first.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Congress of the United States determined on high moral grounds in order that the people might have sound bodies and good education, to legislate that no article produced by labor employed more than eight hours per day should be admitted to interstate commerce, would that not be within its power if the doctrine advanced by the Senator is sound?

Mr. ROBINSON. I express no opinion on that subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not wonder that you do not.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think the cases are analogous at all. I say we recognize the sentiment of the people of the United States that the abuses which exist in child labor by reason of employing children an unreasonable period and at very early ages, and in view of that fact Congress is warranted in using its power to regulate commerce to suppress the evil.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us see. The able Senator from Arkansas knows as well as I do that many people believe it is absolutely against public morals, if not criminal, to make honest Americans, home-loving, vote-casting men, work more than eight hours a day?

The time may come, if it has not already arrived, when the Senator from Arkansas, following his proposition of going according to the public sentiment on a question of constitutional power, as he has done in this case, will be bound by the force of irresistible and unanswerable logic to say to these people, "Well, you contend that it is immoral, that it is destructive to health, that it stunts the growth of manhood to require human beings to work over eight hours a day, and therefore the Congress, in the exercise of the power on which child labor rests, will not allow anything that is made by labor employed more than eight hours a day to go through the channels of interstate commerce." When the Senator does that I should like to see him get his cotton shipped out of Arkansas.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I am anxious to fix in my own mind not only the effect of legislation of this kind, but the intent of it. As I understand the amendment which the Senate committee proposes to the bill, it is not confined to articles that are manufactured partly through child labor?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; it goes much further than that.

Mr. WORKS. Let me illustrate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. WORKS. If in one of the mines a boy of 13 years of age should be employed to carry water to men who are working in the mine, that would bring all of the products of that mine within the prohibition of this act?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WORKS. Now, the question in my mind is, if the bill goes to that extent, how it can justly be claimed by Congress that it is legislation to protect interstate commerce.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no such pretense as that seriously made here.

Mr. WORKS. Or whether it can be construed as having that effect?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no such claim as that made. I want to read you what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said yesterday was the purpose of this bill, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] said it in express words, and without any qualification of any sort, when he made his speech on February 22, and Members of the other House did not cloak it when they made their speeches in that body on this measure. Yesterday in the part of the speech of the junior Senator from Arkansas, which my friend from California evidently missed, the junior Senator from Arkansas thus described the purpose of this legislation:

The necessity for any such rule of evidence does not exist if the Senate provision—

He means the Senate committee amendment—is agreed to. Moreover, the Senate plan seems simpler than the House plan—

It is a good deal simpler; it is beautiful in its stern simplicity—and the more effective to accomplish the end sought—the suppression of child labor through the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not suppose anyone who is undertaking to sustain the bill is undertaking to sustain it upon any other theory than the fact that the Congress of the United States has the power of police regulation under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator from Idaho contend that?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I entertain that view.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, let me tell the Senator what the answer is, according to my opinion as a lawyer and as a Member of this body, to his contention on that point. The Supreme Court of the United States, under a doctrine built up by some of the latter-day decisions, to which reference has been made on this floor, and to which I intend to refer more at length before I conclude this argument, has, in my judgment, laid down the doctrine that there is, in spite of all that the court had held through all the decades that have gone about the United States and its Congress having no police power, certain police power in respect to the agencies of interstate commerce to preserve and protect them from destroying influences and to make them serve the ends for which they are intended, namely, the service of commerce throughout the country, the carriage of commerce throughout the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that seemed to have been the original doctrine when the courts first apparently approached the subject as to what extent the police power could be exercised under the commerce clause of the Constitution; but certainly no one will contend that either the lottery cases or the white slave case could have been sustained upon any theory that it was serving commerce in the economic sense of the term.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; they were sustained on another theory, and later I want to go into the lottery cases more fully, if the Senator will pardon me. I realize the force of the suggestion that he has made. It assaults the very citadel of my position in this matter.

Mr. BORAH. Just a word. I was going to say, in response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia in the way of a criticism of the position of the Senator from Arkansas relative to the eight-hour law, that the Senator from Georgia would not contend that the State in the exercise of its police power could not provide against any other day's labor than that of the eight-hour day, does he?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think not. That is because all the powers not delegated to Congress are reserved to the States, and they have the general power of legislation, except where it is prohibited by constitutional restrictions.

Mr. BORAH. If the State, in the exercise of its police power, may provide for an eight-hour day, and the entire subject matter of interstate commerce has been transferred to the National Government, and it can exercise all the police power that can be exercised in regard to the subject matter, may it not do the same thing with reference to interstate matters?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, it may not; and it may not for the reason that the power of Congress under the commerce clause does not stand by itself and alone, but it stands with several other constitutional powers, and must be construed in pari materia with all of them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me state to the Senator that I am going into that fully, but I have not yet gotten to that branch of my discussion; and if the Senator will just repeat his question later, I will yield to him, and I shall be glad to discuss that matter with him in detail.

Mr. BORAH. I am very sorry to break in on the Senator's very able argument.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am probably anticipating what the Senator from Georgia will eventually cover, but I have an open and inquiring mind on this subject, and I am wondering, under the statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], if this legislation is to be justified on the ground that it is within the police powers of the Government, whether the Government of the United States has the right to execute and enforce its police powers wholly within a State without affecting labor within a State, in which other States, except in a general way—a humanitarian way—have no interest whatever.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from California has given the very gist of the answer that I am about to make, except that I expect to elaborate it and to make one or two other suggestions along that line and similar lines when I come to that part of my argument; but the Senator is right. I will anticipate so far as to say that if the police power with respect to transportation, while the articles are in transit, or if the police power were exercised so as to protect the State from the injurious effects of the consumption of an unsound or unlawful kind of article which the States themselves had no power to protect themselves against, then the result would be very different; but there is no such contention as that in this instance—the pending bill goes far beyond that.

I said just now that we were coquetting—all of us—with the Bull Moose vote on this question, and that is the plain, literal, unvarnished truth. There is not a Senator within the sound of my voice who does not know it or who will dare deny it. We are playing fast and loose with the Constitution of the United States, with our oaths to support it, with the American system of government, with the reserved powers of the States, with the rights of the people, in a mad effort to get a political advantage.

This bill is not Democratic doctrine. Shades of Jefferson, of Madison, of Jackson, and of Cleveland, no! It is not Republican doctrine. Why, the last Republican President of the United States denounced it in as strong words as Jefferson employed about this sort of business. The doctrine came from a seat in the middle aisle on the Republican side of this Chamber, from the then junior Senator from the great State of Indiana, Mr. Beveridge.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator want to read what President Taft said about it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I will be glad to do so if the Senator will give it to me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator reads what ex-President Taft said, it must be borne in mind that at the time the then Senator from Indiana announced that doctrine he was one of the leaders of the Republican Party.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and let me tell you something. I call to the witness chair the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the ranking Senator on the other side, and your floor leader, who said the other day publicly that when the Senator from Indiana proclaimed this doctrine from his seat on this floor every lawyer in this body on both sides of the Chamber who had any position whatever at the bar agreed that it was unconstitutional. At this point, because I have been talking a little about what other people have said, I will ask that the Secretary be allowed to read what former President Taft said about this proposed legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Bills have been urged upon Congress to forbid interstate commerce in goods made by child labor. Such proposed legislation has failed chiefly because it was thought beyond the Federal power. The distinction between the power exercised in enacting the pure-food bill and that which would have been necessary in the case of the child-labor bill is that Congress in the former is only preventing interstate commerce from being a vehicle for conveyance of something which would be injurious to people at its destination, and it might properly decline to permit the use of interstate commerce for that detrimental result. In the latter case Congress would be using its regulative power of interstate commerce not to effect any result of interstate commerce. Articles made by child labor are presumably as good and useful as articles made by adults. The proposed law is to be enforced to discourage the making of articles by child labor in the State from which the articles are shipped. In other words, it seeks indirectly and by duress to compel the State to pass a certain kind of legislation that is completely within their discretion to enact or not. Child labor in the State of the shipment has no legitimate or germane relation to the interstate commerce of which the goods thus made are to form a part, to its character, or to its effect. Such an attempt of Congress to use its power of regulating such commerce to suppress the use of child labor in the State of shipment would be a clear usurpation of that State's rights. (From former President Taft's book entitled "Popular Government," pp. 142, 143.)

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the last presidential election in which we participated, and which we won, was in 1912. We are now about to go into another one, which I hope we may also win, but that is prophecy, and not history.

Mr. BORAH. And very dangerous prophecy.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know about that. It looks to me as if we have been gaining on you recently, as nearly as I can guess about it. When we went into that great fight, here was the banner that we raised aloft to the American people on this subject; there was not a word about child labor; but we said this:

Believing that the most efficient results under our system of government are to be attained by the full exercise by the States of their reserved sovereign powers—

Why that sounds now almost like a "rebel" contention, does it not?

we denounce as usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them and to enlarge and magnify by indirection the powers of the Federal Government.

I call the attention of my friend from Arkansas to that.

Mr. JONES. There is not anything in the platform of 1916 on that great question?

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I will not permit the Senator at this time, because I am going to put in what the Senator has in mind in my own time and in my own way.

Mr. THOMAS. I was simply going to call attention to both platforms.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; in our last platform we have abandoned fundamental doctrine, as the Senator from Colorado knows, and we have done so to please union labor and to coquette with the Bull Moose. They were so anxious to pass this bill that I regret to say the chairman of my own party issued a statement not long ago giving the position of the Democratic Party on child-labor legislation as one of the reasons, among seven or eight others, why the Bull Moose Party in a body ought to vote for the Democratic candidates. I do not want any such votes on any such reasons, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. WORKS. I merely desire to interrupt the Senator upon this very matter. I have been attempting to defend the Southern States against the encroachments of the National Government pretty nearly ever since I have been here.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator has been always sound in his views on this question, so far as I have known.

Mr. WORKS. They have been absolutely giving away, selling their rights, for money to come out of the National Treasury.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; they have sometimes, I am ashamed to say, sold their birthright for a mess of pottage; and most often they did not get the pottage, and threw away the birthright besides. You can not shake your "gory locks at me," for I have not done it. I am not assuming any special virtue over and above my colleagues; but somehow or other I am so built that on fundamentals at least I can not yield; somehow or other I can not help but believe that a political party that is great enough to endure and that deserves to live has to have some fundamental principles in which it believes and to which it is loyal. I was born politically fighting Populism, which was about the same thing as Bull Moosism, subtreasuryism, and all sorts of socialism and paternalism; and I can not get it out of my system. I do not reckon that I ever will until I die. Perhaps when we get to heaven there will be one great, big, beneficent socialism that will work all right. I do not know how it will be elsewhere.

Mr. THOMAS. I am afraid the Senator will never get there. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I have as good a chance as has the Senator from Colorado, I expect.

Mr. THOMAS. A better chance.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a delicate question to raise in this body, however, and I hope no Senator will pursue it.

Now, let us see. As I have shown, this legislation is not Democratic doctrine. Have you on the Republican side anything at all about it in your platform? In a rather hasty search through your platform I can not find a word about child labor. Did you beg for it and plead for it and promise it in 1912? Did you talk about the poor children who were so abused in 1912? My belief is, without a careful and accurate investigation, that you were so busy fighting each other and were so mad with the other wing of your party that you would not indorse anything in any form in which they believed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, one wing of the Republican Party was for it in 1912.

Mr. HARDWICK. One wing! I thought they were a distinct and separate party; that is, up until recently, and I am not sure but that they are yet.

Mr. THOMAS. They are a broken wing now.

Mr. HARDWICK. As my friend from Colorado aptly suggests, they seem to be a broken wing now. There was a platform, however, that did speak for it, and spoke for it in tones of thunder. I have not got it right at hand, because I have lost the reference, but it is in here. I refer to the Progressive platform; and they demanded this legislation in plain, unmistakable terms.

In 1916 the deluge was over. In 1916 Roosevelt, the unquenchable, the unyielding, was as gentle in his dealings with the Republican Party as a bashful maiden when she faces her first lover, and the mutual concessions were in order, and one of them was a yielding of the Republican position with respect to child labor.

Now, I do not blame you, from the standpoint of practical politics, from trying to get back these fellows, if you can without sacrificing your principles; and I do not blame my party for getting as many of them, or of every other kind of American votes, as we can get, provided we do not give up the citadel of Democratic principles in an effort to get them. I am not willing to do that. I will do anything else on earth that is honorable and fair to induce those men or any other American voters to support the Democratic Party; but I can not, in order to get their support, surrender the doctrines of this great party as they have been preached by every leader it has ever had from Thomas Jefferson to Woodrow Wilson.

Here is what the Progressives said in 1916:

A nation to survive must stand for the principles of social and industrial justice.

This is from their Chicago platform of this year. Well, does that mean a Social Labor Party? Is that what it means? It is not the American system. It is not representative government. It is not our dual form of government—social and industrial justice in a broad, general way. There is no surer, no safer, no sounder way, no more certain plan of securing permanent social and industrial justice, than allowing the great functions of this dual government to operate unimpeded and unimpaired, by sapping some of them of their vitality, because the people of each locality know what is best to promote social and industrial justice among themselves. Local self-government and home rule will take care of that.

The Progressive platform of 1916 continues:

We have no right to expect continued loyalty from an oppressed class. We must remove the artificial causes of the high cost of living; prevent the exploitation of men, women, and children in industry by extension of the workmen's compensation law to the full limit permitted under the Constitution, and by a thoroughgoing child-labor law.

Now, there you are. While they were doing that our Republican friends were saying "Me, too," over in another part of Chicago; and, bless goodness, when we got down to St. Louis the party that I love made the unfortunate mistake of doing the same thing. Now, that is what the Senator from Colorado wants to say, I reckon. Yes; we did it. I am not proud of it; I am ashamed of it. I am not going to mince words about this thing. But we did it; and I say very frankly that I am so loyal a party man that if I did not believe that the thing was absolutely unconstitutional I might commit the egregious mistake of voting for it myself. But, of course, I swore down there at the Vice President's desk to support the Constitution of the United States and not a party platform; and I am bound to support the Constitution of the United States as I believe it is—yea, Senators, as I know it is—or be forsworn.

I thoroughly believe in this dual system of Government of ours. It has stood the test of time. It secures to us the great principle, ever dear to the Anglo-Saxon heart, of personal liberty, home rule, local self-government, as well as strong, centralized power for foreign relations and for things that are really Federal or national.

I wanted to read you Mr. Madison's estimate of this Constitution. Why, in these days it is not considered popular sometimes even to express a doubt about what the Constitution means or to be opposed to anything because the Constitution may be against it. It is considered a mere subterfuge among some thoughtless and ill-advised people for opposition to this bill or that bill or the other. I tell you Senators, no more dangerous sentiment can be encouraged or permitted to exist generally among the people of this Republic than a belief that their organic law amounts to nothing when it stands in the way of their whims and their temporary desires.

In a letter to R. H. Lee, of Virginia, then President of the Continental Congress, dated in New York, 1784, on the general subject of the labors of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution, Mr. Madison concluded his observations in this way:

But whatever may be the judgment pronounced on the competency of the architects of the Constitution or whatever may be the destiny of the edifice prepared by them, I feel it a duty to express my profound and solemn conviction, derived from my intimate opportunity of observing and appreciating the views of the convention, collectively and individually, that there never was an assemblage of men charged with a great and arduous trust who were more pure in their motives or more exclusively or anxiously devoted to the object committed to them than were the members of the Federal convention of 1787, to the object of devising and proposing a constitutional system which should best supply the defects of that which it was to replace and best secure the permanent liberty and happiness of their country.

It was a just appraisal of the work of the great men who wrote that great instrument which stands as the model for all free representative Governments on the face of this earth to-day; and yet we sneer at it, and if a man says he can not support this bill or that bill or the other bill because the Constitution will not allow it he is considered old-fashioned, an old fogey, and out of date. Ah, Senators, I beg you, I pray you, to halt! If this continues and increases, the Republic can not live.

Mr. President, in 1798 the famous Kentucky resolutions, drawn by Thomas Jefferson's own hand—the original of those resolutions found in his own handwriting, establishes the authorship which is unchallenged and undenied—read as follows. I will read just the first of the resolutions:

Resolved, That the several States composing the United States of America are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government—

Subsequently, that has been changed by the stern edict of war—

but that by a compact under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for special purposes, delegated to that Government certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; and that whenever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force; that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party, its co-States forming, as to itself, the other party; that the Government created by this compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself; since that would have made its discretion, and not the Constitution, the measure of its powers.

I am afraid that that is what has happened, and that is the reason why I read this resolution—to call attention to that particular expression, that if this Government, as Mr. Jefferson said in the Kentucky resolutions, were constituted the final judge of what its powers should be, the danger was that the Federal Government would make its own desires the measure of its powers, and not the written Constitution of our fathers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator will not contend that the National Government is not the judge of its own powers under the Constitution, will he?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not. I said just now that that had been forever settled. But I think—to use the language of a great Senator from my own State, to whom I am going to refer in just a moment more at length on this question—"cowardice can take no meaner form than when power oppresses weakness"; and that for this Government, because it has the power, because it can do it, and there is no way for people to help it, to usurp powers and rights that do not belong to it, that were never delegated to it, that can not be fairly implied from any of the delegated powers, is as mean and cowardly a thing as any Government on the face of this earth could do, and as dangerous a thing, as utterly destructive of the Government itself, as could possibly be done.

Now, let us see. In a letter to Gideon Granger, dated Monticello, August 18, 1800, Mr. Jefferson said this:

DEAR SIR: I received with great pleasure your favor of June the 4th, and am much comforted by the appearance of a change of opinion in your State; for though we may obtain, and I believe shall obtain, a majority in the Legislature of the United States, attached to the preservation of the Federal Constitution according to its obvious principles, and those on which it was known to be received; attached equally to the preservation to the States of those rights unquestionably remaining with them; friends to the freedom of religion, freedom of the press, trial by jury, and to economical government; opposed to standing armies, paper systems, war, and all connection, other than commerce, with any foreign nation; in short, a majority firm in all those principles which we have espoused and the Federalists have opposed uniformly; still, should the whole body of New England continue in opposition to these principles of government, either knowingly or through delusion, our Government will be a very uneasy one. It can never be harmonious and solid while so respectable a portion of its citizens support principles which go directly to a change of the Federal Constitution, to sink the State governments, consolidate them into one, and to monarchize that. Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government.

That is what I am pointing out now. I want to interpolate, if Senators will note, that staying here month in and month out, almost year in and year out, we are hardly able to get through the Federal business with some reasonable confinement to Federal limitations of the business we assume to transact. But if, in addition to that, as is proposed by the principle in this bill—because it is the entering wedge for it all—we are to enter into the control and determination of local legislation in each one of the 48 States of the American Republic, I tell you we will have not time to do it, and we will have no information upon which to act intelligently. We will not be able, either in point of time or in point of accurate and reliable information, to perform the function that we will thus usurp.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator is complaining about usurpation on the part of the National Government. I wonder how fully he realizes the fact that the most of this is being done by representatives of the States themselves by way of legislation?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, does the Senator know why? I will give the Senator my idea. In the first place, they tempt themselves and their constituencies with appropriations, as was suggested just now. In the second place, if they want to accomplish some temporary reform that seems to be so important, just like this, so necessary, so just, so humane, for the moment they sacrifice all considerations of governmental principle, and proceed to do it without delay and without regard to anything else except the object immediately in hand. I am afraid that that is the truth. I have been here in both Houses of Congress some 15 or 16 years, and that is my observation. I have a great respect and a great affection for Members of both bodies, and yet I think that that is the trouble. I do not know what the Senator's opinion is, but I think his long experience might probably lead him to concur with me.

Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Lee, continues:

Public servants, at such a distance and from under the eye of their constituents, must, from the circumstance of distance, be unable to administer and overlook all the details necessary for the good government of the citizens, and the same circumstance, by rendering detection impossible to their constituents, will invite the public agents to corruption, plunder, and waste. And I do verily believe that if the principle were to prevail of a common law being in force in the United States (which principle possessed the General Government at once of all the powers of the State governments and reduces us to a single consolidated Government) it would become the most corrupt government on the earth.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator give us the date of that letter?

Mr. HARDWICK. August 13, 1800.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. How many States were there in the Union at that time?

Mr. HARDWICK. I suppose there were something like 15 or 16. I do not remember exactly how many had been admitted by that time.

Again, I read from Mr. Jefferson's correspondence, in his letter to Mr. M. Destutt Tracy, dated Monticello, January 26, 1811, more than 11 years after the other one was written, when his mind was more mature and his experience larger. Here is what he said. There were 17 States then:

But the true barriers of our liberty in this country are our State governments; and the wisest conservative power ever contrived by man, is that of which our Revolution and present Government found us possessed. Seventeen distinct States, amalgamated into one as to their foreign concerns, but single and independent as to their internal administration, regularly organized with legislature and governor resting on the choice of the people, and enlightened by a free press, can never be so fascinated by the arts of one man as to submit voluntarily to his usurpation. Nor can they be constrained to it by any force he can possess. While that may paralyze the single State in which it happens to be encamped, 16 others, spread over a country of 2,000 miles diameter, rise up on every side, ready organized for deliberation by a constitutional legislature, and for action by their governor, constitutionally the commander of the militia of the State; that is to say, of every man in it able to bear arms; and that militia, too, regularly formed into regiments and battalions, into Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery, trained under officers general and subordinate, legally appointed, always in readiness, and to whom they are already in habits of obedience. The republican Government of France was lost without a struggle because the party of "un et indivisible" had prevailed; no provincial organizations existed to which the people might rally under authority of the laws, the seats of the directory were virtually vacant, and a small force sufficed to turn the legislature out of their chamber and to salute its leader chief of the nation. But with us, 16 out of 17 States rising in mass, under regular organization and legal commanders, united in object and action by their Congress, or, if that be in duress, by a special convention present such obstacles to an usurper as forever to stifle ambition in the first conception of that object.

Dangers of another kind might more reasonably be apprehended from this perfect and distinct organization, civil and military, of the States, to wit, that certain States from local and occasional discontents might attempt to secede from the Union. This is certainly possible, and would be befriended by this regular organization. But it is not probable that local discontents can spread to such an extent as to be able to face the sound parts of so extensive a Union; and if they should reach the majority they would then become the Regular Government, acquire the ascendancy in Congress, and be able to redress their own grievances by laws peaceably and constitutionally passed. And even the States in which local discontents might engender a commencement of fermentation would be paralyzed and self-checked by that very division into parties into which we have fallen, into which all States must fall wherein men are at liberty to think, speak, and act freely, according to the diversities of their individual conformations, and which are, perhaps, essential to preserve the purity of the government, by the censorship which these parties habitually exercise over each other.

You will read, I am sure, with indulgence, the explanations of the grounds on which I have ventured to form an opinion differing from yours. They prove my respect for your judgment, and diffidence in my own, which have forbidden me to retain, without examination, an opinion questioned by you. Permit me now to render my portion of the general debt of gratitude by acknowledgments in advance for the singular benefaction which is the subject of this letter, to tender my wishes for the continuance of a life so usefully employed, and to add the assurances of my perfect esteem and respect.

Mr. President and Senators, the most brilliant figure that ever represented on this floor and in this Chamber the great Commonwealth from which I come was Benjamin Harvey Hill—the dashing Rupert of short-arm debate, the invincible Achilles of prepared and sustained controversial discussion. A son of Georgia and of the South, who loved them both with an almost idolatrous devotion; he was also a great, broad-minded, broad-gauged American patriot, whose mighty vision swept to the farthest corners of this country, and whose mighty love embraced all her people. Just at this juncture my mind turns naturally to him, for of all the American statesmen of his time he had the truest concept of our great dual system of government, of Federal power, and of the rights and powers of the States; and he expressed his views on that subject with a clarity that never has been equaled, and with an eloquence that rarely has been excelled.

In a speech made by this great American, in the days when reconstruction was hardly over, to the people of my State, my recollection is in 1876, Mr. Hill said what I shall read:

There are two great essential features of this great system, without either of which the whole system would fall, and I shall briefly call your attention to these two essential features. Every man in America ought to understand them and be able to give a reason why the American Union is a great system of government and why this system, represented by that flag floating above us, ought to be dear to every American citizen. The first essential feature of this American system is this: That there shall be a general government for general affairs and a local government for local affairs. That is the first underlying fundamental and indispensable principle of the American system of government. It was a happy thought. There are certain affairs which are general to all the people of this country equally. If you did not have one general government clothed with jurisdiction to manage those general affairs, each State would have to manage them for herself. That would multiply the expense and dangers of our foreign affairs thirty-eight times; that would multiply our standing armies thirty-eight times; that would multiply all the machinery of general government thirty-eight times—

Since there were 38 States when he spoke—that would line the borders of 38 States with customhouse and foreign regulations and military fortifications. To avoid such burdens, our fathers provided one General Government to take charge of all the affairs that were general and common to all the States alike, leaving each State to manage its own local affairs in its own way.

Why? Because each State would be the best judge of what local laws suited its own people—

Ah, gentlemen, how different is this situation.

Why? Because each State would be the best judge of what local laws suited its own people, better than any foreign States, and better than any government representing a great number of States. So that, I repeat, the first great leading idea and fundamental feature in this American system of government is a general government for general affairs and local or State governments for local or State affairs.

Listen to another striking phrase from this great man. Remember he was speaking in 1876:

Who, then, I repeat, is a disunionist? The man who strikes at the Federal Government is a disunionist, because he strikes at an essential feature of the system which makes the American Union. But the man who strikes at the State government is also a disunionist, because he strikes at an equally essential feature of the same system. He alone is a perfect Union man who is faithful to the whole system—to both the General Government and the State Government, each in its sphere. Blot out the stars from that flag and you have no American flag; blot out the States from this Union and you have no American Union. Cripple the States and you cripple the Union. Invade the States and you invade the Union. Make war on the States and you are a traitor making war on the Union.

Senators, I think that is probably the most eloquent language in all American political literature. I invite the attention of the Senate to this speech. It is most interesting. He concludes his speech in this way:

My countrymen, have you studied this wonderful American system of free government? Have you compared it with former systems and noted how our forefathers sought to avoid their defects? Let me commend this study to every American citizen to-day. To him who loves liberty it is more enchanting than romance, more bewitching than love, and more elevating than any other science. Our fathers adopted this plan, with improvements in the details, which can not be found in any other system. With what a noble impulse of patriotism they came together from different States and joined their counsels to perfect this system, thenceforward to be known as the "American system of free constitutional government!" The snows that fall on Mount Washington are not purer than the motives which begot it. The fresh dew-laden zephyrs from the orange groves of the South are not sweeter than the hopes its advent inspired. The flight of our own symbolic eagle, though he blow his breath on the sun, can not be higher than its expected destiny. Have the motives which so inspired our fathers become all corrupt in their children? Are the hopes that sustained them all poisoned to us? Is that high expected destiny all eclipsed, and before its noon?

Senators, no greater American, no more brilliant orator and no truer patriot ever lived in the great State of Georgia or in this country. I would that his almost inspired words could guide us in this matter. I can see him sitting in the seat I now occupy by a favor of my people far beyond my poor deserts, and I know that the vote I am going to cast will be the vote that Benjamin Harvey Hill would have cast on this great question.

It would not do to quote entirely from southern patriots, from southern statesmen, from great Democrats. I do not know the politics of the man I am going to quote next from, but I do know that he is regarded throughout this Republic as probably the greatest constitutional lawyer and the greatest authority on constitutional law who has ever lived in this country. I think he was a Michigan man.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Judge Cooley, of Michigan?

Mr. HARDWICK. Before I leave Senator Hill I want to say one thing to the Senate, and really that was one of the chief reasons, although I am devotedly attached to his memory, that I made such extended reference to his writing and speeches on this great subject.

Senator Hill was elected to this body in 1877 and died on August 16, I think, 1882, just before the expiration of his first term, while he was the idol of his State and the cynosure of every eye in the Nation. Former Senator Bailey told me within a week—and I have his permission to make reference to it in this public way or, of course, I would not do it—while Senator Hill was in the very heyday of his brilliant career and he, Bailey, was a young man he came to Washington just before Hill's death. It was almost Mr. Bailey's first appearance here. I do not think he was in public life at that time, but he had had many interesting conversations with Senator Hill. It seems that Senator Hill was a distant relation of his. Finally on one occasion he said to Senator Hill, "Senator, I want to ask you a question, if I may do so without being presumptuous." Senator Hill said to him in that kindly way he had, especially with young men, "There will be no presumption about it, my boy. Ask your question." He said, "Senator Hill, I recall that prior to the Civil War you began your political career in Georgia as a Whig. You were elected to the Legislature of Georgia as a Whig, and after that party went to pieces in the wreck of the Kansas-Nebraska decision and the slavery trouble you practically organized in your State the Know Nothing Party and became its candidate for governor of Georgia, and in a momentous and hotly contested and close election you were beaten by a very small majority in a great Democratic State." He said, "Since the war you have been a thorough Democrat in every respect, devoted to its principles and true to its teachings. I want to know why it is that prior to the Civil War you were everything else but a Democrat, and since the Civil War you seem to be so splendidly versed in Democratic principles and so ardent and loyal in that faith." Hill replied—and it is the key, Senators, to his whole political career—"My son, prior to the Civil War I realized that if the Union was ever endangered at all it would be from its centrifugal forces, that the States were too powerful, and that their powers were augmented too often at the expense of the General Government, and if disunion and disaster ever overtook us it would come from those centrifugal forces. Since the Civil War," he said, "the exact reverse has been true. The danger to the American system of government, the danger to our institutions, comes now and will come for a long period of years from the centrifugal forces in this Republic. They are becoming too powerful; they are encroaching on those rights and powers of the State; they are constantly encroaching upon the functions of the States; they are constantly usurping the different functions of local government."

Senators, it was a wonderful answer and it gave the keynote to the political career of a great American statesman.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator a moment ago referred to Judge Cooley. May I say just a word on that subject?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Cooley was at one time chief justice of the State of Michigan. There were the big three, as they were known, Cooley, Christiancy, and Campbell; and I think their decisions were more generally quoted and have been throughout the United States as authority than any other court in any other State in the Union. He was also on the Interstate Commerce Commission. He was one of the first commissioners appointed to that body.

Mr. HARDWICK. To the very just and deserved tribute of the Senator from Michigan I want to add, and I think every lawyer in this body will agree with me, that his work on constitutional law remains to this day the standard work on that subject in this country, in my judgment. I read from Cooley on Constitutional Law, pages 29 and 30, third edition. Judge Cooley says:

The government created by the Constitution is one of limited and enumerated powers, and the Constitution is the measure and the test of the powers conferred. Whatever is not conferred is withheld and belongs to the several States or to the people thereof. As a constitutional principle this must result from a consideration of the circumstances under which the Constitution was formed. The States were in existence before and possessed and exercised nearly all the powers of sovereignty. The Union was in existence, but the Congress which represented it possessed a few powers only, conceded to it by the States, and these circumscribed and hampered in a manner to render them of little value. The States were thus repositories of sovereign powers, and wielded them as being theirs of inherent right; the Union possessed but few powers, enumerated, limited, and hampered, and these belonged to it by compact and concession. In a confederation thus organized, if a power could be in dispute between the States and the confederacy, the presumption must favor the States. But it was not within the intent of those who formed the Constitution to revolutionize the States, to overturn the presumptions that supported their authority, or to create a new government with uncertain and undefined powers. The purpose, on the contrary, was to perpetuate the States in their integrity and to strengthen the Union in order that they might be perpetuated. To this end the grant of powers to the confederacy needed to be enlarged and extended, the machinery of government to be added to and perfected, the people to be made parties to the charter of government, and the sanction of law and judicial authority to be given to the legitimate acts of the Government in any and all of its departments. But when this had been done, it remained true that the Union possessed the powers conferred upon it, and that these were to be found enumerated in the instrument of government under which it was formed. But lest there might be any possible question of this in the minds of those yielding any portion of this authority, it was declared by the tenth article of the amendments that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

I want to say, Senators, that later, in another part of this discussion, I will read an extract from Judge Cooley squarely on this proposition of child-labor legislation, and against it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that Judge Cooley clearly laid down the doctrine that the National Government has the power of police regulation with reference to interstate commerce?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; except in the limited way the Senator and I were discussing it this morning. I think he clearly drew that line. If I am in error, I hope the Senator will later call attention to it.

Mr. BORAH. I will not interrupt the Senator now; but I have a reference to Judge Cooley to that effect.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think you will find that he drew the same line I attempted to draw this morning, unless my memory is very inaccurate on that point. I have not examined his work on that particular question recently, but I feel sure my memory is accurate.

Now, I am going to quote from another authority—not a great lawyer, although the gentleman who wrote it was bred to the law, but a great statesman, a great public man, a great President, a man of wonderful intellectuality. In all my life I have come in contact with but few men who, in my judgment, in any way approached him in intellectuality. I refer to the President of the United States. Senators on both sides know that my tribute to him is absolutely beyond all challenge. Not even the exigency of party conflict or the heat of partisan rancor can induce any Senator of the United States to deny that proposition, whether he be Democrat or Republican.

Before Mr. Wilson was President of the United States he was president of one of the three or four greatest American universities, and it was while he was serving in that capacity that the wonderful clearness of his views, the wonderful vigor of his intellect, and the wonderful soundness of his opinions attracted my attention and challenged my enthusiastic admiration.

I am going to read now some of the views of the present President of the United States—in accordance with Jefferson's views, with Madison's views, with Hill's views, with all the great Democrats alive and dead—on this question of local self-government and the rights and powers and responsibilities and duties of the States. Referring to this struggle between State and Federal power, in his book on constitutional law, to which the Senator from Idaho made passing reference the other day, there is a great deal in this book on this question. It is a print of these lectures that were delivered to the Princeton students.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the date?

Mr. HARDWICK. Nineteen hundred and seven. The lectures, I think, were delivered in 1906. I remember when they were printed. I used to read such portions of them as were printed with great admiration, as I do yet. Now, discussing this trouble, this constant conflict between State and Federal power and authority that seems to inhere in our dual system of government, from which there seems to be little escape, I want to read you what President Wilson said:

And now the question has come upon us anew. It is no longer sectional, but it is all the more subtle and intricate, all the less obvious and tangible in its elements, on that account. It involves, first or last, the whole economic movement of the age, and necessitates an analysis which has not yet been even seriously attempted. Which parts of the many-sided processes of the Nation's economic development shall be left to the regulation of the States, which parts shall be given over to the regulation of the Federal Government? I do not propound this as a mere question of choice, a mere question of statesmanship, but also as a question, a very fundamental question, of constitutional law. What, reading our Constitution in its true spirit, neither sticking in its letter nor yet forcing it arbitrarily to mean what we wish it to mean, shall be the answer of our generation, pressed upon by gigantic economic problems, the solution of which may involve not only the prosperity but also the very integrity of the Nation, to the old question of the distribution of powers between Congress and the States? For us, as for previous generations, it is a deeply critical question. The very stuff of all our political principles, of all our political experience, is involved in it. In this all too indistinctly marked field of right choice our statesmanship shall achieve new triumphs or come to calamitous shipwreck.

The old theory of the sovereignty of the States, which used so to engage our passions, has lost its vitality. The war between the States established at least this principle, that the Federal Government is, through its courts, the final judge of its own powers. Since that stern arbitrament it would be idle, in any practical argument, to ask by what law of abstract principle the Federal Government is bound and restrained.

Now, I am quoting from something the Senator from Idaho quoted in part the other day. He began right here:

Mr. Wilson continues:

"Its power is 'to regulate commerce between the States,' and the attempts now made during every session of Congress to carry the implications of that power."

I commend this to my distinguished friend from Arkansas, the junior Senator—

"and the attempts now made during every session of Congress to carry the implications of that power beyond the utmost boundaries of reasonable and honest inference show that the only limits likely to be observed by politicians"—

Of course, I do not think he was referring to the Senator from Arkansas—

"are those set by the good sense and conservative temper of the country."

"The proposed Federal legislation with regard to the regulation of child labor affords a striking example. If the power to regulate commerce between the States can be stretched to include the regulation of labor in mills and factories, it can be made to embrace every particular of the industrial organization and action of the country. The only limitations Congress would observe, should the Supreme Court assent to such obviously absurd extravagances of interpretation, would be the limitations of opinion and of circumstance."

That is what you are doing. You are stretching; you, a southern Democrat.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think so.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am just telling you what the President thinks.

Mr. ROBINSON. What the President used to think. You are not telling what he thinks.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the President changed his mind about this?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. The President is advocating this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Surely the Senator must be mistaken about that. I can not credit it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I am unable to enlighten the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course I think the Senator must have misunderstood him.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMPSON. That was before the decision of the Supreme Court on this question.

Mr. HARDWICK. The President has not been a practicing lawyer. He did not base any of this sound doctrine on any decision.

Mr. THOMPSON. But a great many of us have changed our minds since the Supreme Court has decided the question.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will discuss the decisions a little later. Of course the Senator may be right. Wise men change their minds very often, but I have yet to see any reason upon which any alleged change of mind upon the part of the President is based or upon which it rests. I confess I should like to see it as a matter of curiosity. I should like the Senator, as long as he is now about it, to give us the reasons for it if he can.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for an interruption?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly. My remarks do not apply to the Senator any more than to any other Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that. I am not taking it any more seriously than the Senator from Georgia intended it; but I had assumed, of course, that the Senator from Georgia knew that the President had expressed his friendliness to this legislation. If that information has not reached the Senator from Georgia, then I will admit that he seems to be living in the past.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Georgia would rather live in the past in some respects than in the present.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Georgia would adorn any age in which he lived.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator very much. I am rather old-fashioned. I do not believe in these radical changes about fundamental principles overnight, and I am not going to indorse them. I do not care who changes; the Senator from Arkansas can do just as he likes. Of course, I saw it printed in the papers that the President came up here and told us—he did not tell me, of course; he told some of us—that this legislation must pass, and pass at this session. Well, he may have done it. I do not know. The newspapers are not always accurate. I do not know whether he did or not, but if he did I imagine he came with crape on his hat. If he did, I imagine he came in mourning for the death of his ideals. If he did, I imagine he came in sorrow. Mr. Wilson continues:

The proposed Federal legislation with regard to the regulation of child labor affords a striking example. If the power to regulate commerce between the States can be stretched—

This sounds like just some of my speech. That is one reason why I am so strong for him, and always have been—can be stretched to include the regulation of labor in mills and factories it can be made to embrace every particular of the industrial organization and action of the country.

Including the Senator's cotton pickers down in Arkansas:

The only limitations Congress would observe should the Supreme Court assent to such obviously absurd extravagances of interpretation would be the limitations of opinion and of circumstance.

I would not care in this presence to so characterize the proposition submitted by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, but I must read the book right. It was in the book and it is right:

It is important, therefore, to look at the facts and to understand the real character—

I am still reading from Mr. Wilson—of the political and economic materials of our own day very clearly and with a statesmanlike vision, as the makers of the Constitution understood the conditions they dealt with.

He was everlasting and eternally right, and he is right yet; and I dislike to credit any report from any irresponsible newspaper source or from any Senator that the President has paper source or from any Senator that the President has reversed all of these sound views. I simply can not believe it.

If the jealousies of the colonies and of the little States which sprang out of them had not obliged the makers of the Constitution to leave the greater part of legal regulation in the hands of the States, it would have been wise, it would even have been necessary, to invent such a division of powers as was actually agreed upon. It is not, at bottom, a question of sovereignty or of any other political abstrac-tion; it is a question of vitality. Uniform regulation of the economic conditions of a vast territory and a various people like the United States would be mischievous, if not impossible.

Jefferson himself never put it any stronger or any better.

But Mr. Wilson continues:

The statesmanship which really attempts it is premature and unwise. Undoubtedly the recent economic development of the country, particularly the development of the last two decades, has obliterated many boundaries, made many interests national and common, which until our own day were separate and local; but the lines of these great changes we have not yet clearly traced or studiously enough considered. To distinguish them and provide for them is the task which is to test the statesmanship of our generation; and it is already plain that, great as they are, these new combinations of interest have not yet gone so far as to make the States mere units of local government. Not our legal conscience merely, but our practical interests as well, call upon us to discriminate and be careful, with the care of men who handle the vital stuff of a great constitutional government.

You might have said, if I did not read some more of it, that that let him out; that he was preparing for this change of front that you now charge him with. Let us see.

Again, Mr. Wilson says:

The United States are not a single, homogeneous community. In spite of a certain superficial sameness which seems to impart to Americans a common type and point of view, they still contain communities at almost every stage of development, illustrating in their social and economic structure almost every modern variety of interest and prejudice, following occupations of every kind, in climates of every sort that the Temperate Zone affords. This variety of fact and condition, these substantial economic and social contrasts, do not in all cases follow State lines. They are often contrasts between region and region rather than between State and State. But they are none the less real, and are in many instances permanent and ineradicable.

I am not going to read all of this, but I want to read one more quotation from it.

Again, Mr. Wilson says:

It would be fatal to our political vitality really to strip the States of their powers and transfer them to the Federal Government. It can not be too often repeated that it has been the privilege of separate development secured to the several regions of the country by the Constitution, and not the privilege of separate development only, but also that other more fundamental privilege that lies back of it, the privilege of independent local opinion and individual conviction, which has given speed, facility, vigor, and certainty to the processes of our economic and political growth.

Now, listen. I commend this to my friends who advocate this bill:

To buy temporary ease and convenience for the performance of a few great tasks of the hour at the expense of that—would be to pay too great a price and to cheat all generations for the sake of one.

"That" is local self-government—

Jefferson never wrote sounder Democracy nor sounder Americanism. Madison never contended for a more correct principle. The eloquent dead Senator from my own State, from whom I quoted at length, analytical and eloquent as he was, never in his life expressed it better. It was true when he said it, and it is true to-day. It is the ark of the covenant of my faith, and upon it I still rest.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator remember that on the President's western trip—I can not quote him exactly—but he said, substantially, referring to his change of mind on the preparedness question, that when he ceased to change his mind he would become a back number? Does not the Senator recognize the right of the President to change his mind and not to become a back number?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; and I am not criticizing him for it. In fact, I am not certain that he has done it—not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator knows that the Democratic platform declared for it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I decline to yield to the Senator. I am not sure that the President has changed his mind on this question, even if he has, as alleged, changed his position.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator decline to yield to a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I decline to yield now. I am going to make my statement in my own way.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought the Senator invited interruptions.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Arkansas declined to yield to everybody, if my recollection is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I did not decline to yield; but, as I said, I preferred not to yield to controversial questions.

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely wanted to know if the Senator from Georgia did not know that the plank of the platform on which the President was running for President declared for this bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. What is a plank of a party platform against the Constitution?

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will yield for another question, I wish to say that he has suggested that he did not know the President's attitude upon this subject. Is the Senator serious in that statement or is he humorous?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I will tell you. The Senator has put me a pretty hard question. Of course it is half serious, and only half serious.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will withdraw it.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; do not withdraw it. I am going to answer it. You need not worry.

It is reported that the President came up here—the newspapers said so—and asked for the passage of this bill and insisted on it at this session, prior to the election. I have some reason to believe that that may be accurate, but the reasons for his change of heart and whether he still believes what he has written in this book I do not know and can not say; but I have yet to see the color of the Senator's hair or eyes who can give me any accurate information on the subject.

Ah, Senators, I do not know what course others may adopt, but as for me and mine we will serve the Lord on this question. We are not going to surrender the rights of the States; we are not going to surrender the blessings of local self-government; we are not going to surrender, so far as I can prevent it, the fundamental principles of American liberty and of American constitutional government, to advance any campaign or to do anything political in any way whatever. "If that be treason, make the most of it"; if that be disloyalty, the oath I took and the obligation I owe to the 3,000,000 people of Georgia and to her dead as well as to her living, to her great men who sat in this Chamber and who have illustrated American constitutional principles on this floor, compels me, so long as my own view of the Constitution remains as it is—and it is not likely to change—to stand steadfast for the rights of the States, for local self-government, for the Constitution that our fathers wrote.

Ah, Senators, the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] struck at the very kernel of it. This bill hardly pretends to be even a subterfuge; it simply says to a man in Georgia, in Iowa, in New Jersey, or in any other State of this Union, "You regulate the hours of employment and conditions of labor, purely domestic and internal affairs, admittedly matters of State concern, and of exclusive State concern, according to the standards we set up or we will not"—do what? "We not only will not admit the product of labor that is not in accordance with our standards to our channels of interstate commerce, and permit it to be carried by our agencies into commerce, but whatever else you have got, whatever else you make, even if labor of that prohibited kind was not employed in it, we will put that out, too, because you did not obey our law." That is what it amounts to.

You could say to him with equal right, so far as the power goes, that a man who runs a factory like that in violation of this congressional rule of civil conduct will not be allowed to go on a passenger train or to carry his wife and children on a passenger train in interstate commerce. You could say to a man who printed the lottery ticket, "You may print Sunday-school hymns, but they shall not go into interstate commerce, because they came out of the same factory from which lottery tickets came." You may say to a man who prints lottery tickets, "You may print the Bible, the Word of Almighty God, but it shall not go because the same printing press that runs off the lottery ticket runs off the Bible; and the Bible, under those circumstances, is liable to do tremendous harm."

You do not even profess to confine your prohibition to the product; you do not even pretend that you are merely indulging in a nice little fiction about this thing; but you undertake to prohibit the shipment of articles perfectly legitimate in character, inherently sound, through the channels of interstate commerce simply because some man will not do what you tell him about the kind of laborers he shall employ or how many hours he shall require them to work in whatever State he happens to reside, regardless of what are the laws of that State on the subject.

Ah, Senators, there is no need to pursue the subject. It is demonstration complete; there is no answer to it. The bill is subterfuge and indirection, unashamed and confessed. That is what it is. If you can do that, as I suggested to my friend from Arkansas, you can also say that you will not permit the product of any factories that employ people over eight hours a day to go through the channels of interstate commerce, and you can make for that proposition every argument of humanity and humanitarianism, every appeal to sentiment and sentimentalism, that is made for this bill in the opinion of a vast number of people; and, after all, according to the Senator's theory, what difference does it make, because if Congress is the judge, and if Congress says that it is a great and humane purpose to allow only those articles that are made by eight-hour labor to go through the channels of interstate commerce and that anything else is wicked and inhumane and offends the great public sentiment of this country, and that position can be sustained, there is no limit to congressional power; none whatever.

I warn the Senator from Arkansas, and I warn every other Senator on this side of the Chamber, that he is about to open a Pandora's box that sooner or later will destroy our people because of the noxious diseases that is will unloose. The evil may be very small in regard to this particular matter, it may be almost infinitesimal, but I will tell you right now, Senators, that I believe a majority of the States in the Union have already better child-labor laws than this bill proposes; so there is little real need for this legislation.

Oh, Senators, if you want to get a mess of pottage for your birthright again, for heaven's sake get something that you need more than you do this thing; get something that is worth while to you; get something that will do some practical good. I invite any Senator on this floor to challenge my statement this morning that the child-labor law of my own Commonwealth, which this bill seeks to supersede, is better than the law that would supplant it.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I understand the Senator—The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Chair will request Senators when they seek to take the floor to address the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. Do I understand the Senator to be of the opinion that this law, if enacted, would supersede the law of his own State?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly it will, because almost 90 per cent of modern business, or at least a great per cent of it, must go through the channels of interstate commerce. The Senator knows that as well as I do. There is not a great factory in any great State of this Union that could live if its products were denied shipment in interstate commerce. Therefore, they must reform to whatever requirements Congress makes.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President—

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was merely going to suggest to the Senator that the enactment of this bill would not interfere in any way with the efficiency of the law in force in the States, so far as the regulation of factories is concerned for State purposes.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true, technically speaking, but I will say to the Senator that if you impose this obligation, this standard on the people of a State, they will simply be unable to do business, unless they can also send their products through the channels of interstate commerce.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. HARDWICK. Probably I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The State of Georgia has enacted a law for the protection of the children of Georgia. The enactment of this bill will not impair in any way the Georgia law for the protection of the Georgia children. That law will remain in force; and the Federal law would only have reference to the right to use the mediums of interstate commerce.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is another question, if it will, and it will not. It will not interfere, so far as the technical proposition is concerned that the State law remains on the books; but it will absolutely supersede and destroy the State law, because the mills can not live and do business unless they can come under the terms of this bill and can ship their product through the channels of interstate commerce. Am I right about that? I do not think there are any two views possible about that.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator and I misunderstand each other. The point I was trying to make is this: The State of Georgia or any other State can go on enacting more and more favorable legislation on this subject than it now has.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the Senator that we have a law in the State of Georgia that, according to my information—and I think it is accurate—everybody agrees is a better law than the law which it is now proposed to place on the Federal statute book, and yet no matter what our law may be we are told that we have not sense enough to attend to our own business; that we do not know how to enact a law that suits our local conditions, but that Congress, in its wisdom, knows more than we do and knows better about this purely local matter. I was not in the legislature which enacted that law, and I do not contend that the legislature of my State is infallible, but I do believe it has enacted a wise, just, and humane law on this subject and will improve it whenever the opportunity for improvement presents itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. In just a moment—but I do say that I had rather trust the legislature of my State, yea, a thousand times, to act on local matters, to pass on the laws of contract, of life and death, of liberty and imprisonment, of labor, and of everything else within the bounds of the State, than to have such legislation enacted in Washington, where men have not the time to transact such business for them, nor the inclination to do so, nor the opportunity to acquire the information that is necessary to enable them to do what is right, and never can know what is right as to such matters. Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question for information. Is it not a fact that Georgia has a 60-hour-a-week limitation or provision in its law; and is it not also a fact that in its operation it allows 11 hours a day labor, because of the fact that it is the custom in that State to work only five and a half days a week, Saturday afternoon being an actual holiday; and if, under the law of Georgia, children do not work 11 hours a day in factories?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to read, since the question has been raised, Georgia's statute on this question. That is the answer, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not care to have it read. I am familiar with it; and that is my construction of it, together with the information I have concerning it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want the Senate to see how just the Senator's construction of it is, and that is why I want to read it. The Senator, as I understood, wanted to ask me the question for information.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will take the word of the Senator from Georgia upon the statute; but I ask him if it is not a fact that under the provisions of the local law in the State of Georgia an 11-hour day is enforced?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Or 60 hours per week, with a half day on Saturday.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think that can be the case under the State statute.

Mr. ROBINSON. It might be if the statute were not enforced.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, the suggestion does not do the Senator credit, although, of course, he does not so intend it. We have a law-abiding people.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not question that.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the law is enforced; there is no trouble about that. We have about as much machinery for its enforcement as is provided in the pending bill, except we have not provided for a lot of spying inspectors.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the limitation as to hours per week and as to the age of children?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to read the law.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, even if it be conceded that the law is not properly enforced in Georgia, has Congress authority to go into a State and see to the enforcement of the State law?

Mr. HARDWICK. It seems so from the contention that is being made here in connection with this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Nobody contends that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to learn that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Georgia, I am sure, did not understand me as making such a contention.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have known people to contend that, and it is the contention of a very strong element in this country, with which the Senator seems to be aligned in this matter. That is one of the arguments made—that if the States do not enforce their laws, then the Government shall intervene.

Mr. ROBINSON. That might be an argument in justification of Congress exercising such powers as it has to correct a recognized evil.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not believe that Congress has any power to enforce the laws of a State.

Mr. ROBINSON. Nobody claims that Congress has power to enforce State laws. Congress enforces its own laws; but the fact that the States do not enforce their own laws as to matters of this kind might justify Congress, in exercising the power it possesses to regulate commerce, to suppress an evil.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so. The Senator has elaborated his views on the subject, and I understand them. I am glad he is not quite so bad as I thought he was on this question when I first heard him. He will get back, perhaps, to his ancient moorings at some time, but the lesson, I fear, will be a bitter one before he does.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, did the Senator understand me to say that I thought the Federal Congress could enforce a State law, a law enacted by a State legislature?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell the Senator what I understood him to say. I understood the Senator to say—and his conduct speaks louder than his words—that Congress can say to a man in Georgia, "You must not work labor of a certain kind, or you must not work labor more than certain hours"—admittedly matters of local regulation, admittedly matters for domestic regulation by the State governments—"or, if you do you can not transport the articles you make through the channels of interstate commerce, and before we get through with you we may conclude not to let you and your wife ride on the railroad trains."

Mr. President, I am a little weary, and I now ask the Secretary to read the statute of Georgia on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the statute referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

REGULATING EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

An act regulating the employment of children; to provide for the issuance of certificates with reference to age and educational qualifications of children; the revocation of such certificates by the commissioner of labor; designating prohibited hours of labor for such children; making it the duty of the commissioner of labor and authorized assistants to enforce this act; making it a misdemeanor to violate the provisions of this act; and to repeal the act approved August 1, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate the employment of children in factories and manufacturing establishments in this State, and to provide for the punishments of violations of the regulations prescribed, and for other purposes," and which said act repealed is codified in sections 3143, 3144, 3145, 3146, 3147, 3148, and 3149 of the Code of Georgia of 1910, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia, That no child under the age of 14 years shall be employed by or permitted to work in or about any mill, factory, laundry, manufacturing establishment, or place of amusement, except that children over 12 years of age who have widowed mothers dependent upon them for support, or orphan children over 12 years of age dependent upon their own labor for support, may work in factories and manufactories, except that the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be applicable in instances specified and provided for in section 8 of this act.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that no child under 14 years and 6 months shall be employed or be permitted to work in any of the establishments or occupations mentioned in section 1, unless the person, firm, or corporation employing such child has and keeps on file accessible to the officials charged with the enforcement of this act a certificate from the superintendent of schools in the county or city in which such child resides, that such child is not less than 14 years of age, has attended school for not less than 12 weeks of the 12 months preceding the date of issuance of such certificate, except that the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be applicable in instances specified and provided for in section 8 of this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that the certificate mentioned in the foregoing section shall state the full name, date and place of birth of the child, with the name and address of the parent, guardian, or person sustaining the parental relationship to such child, and that the child has appeared before the officer and satisfactory evidence submitted that the child is of legal age. Blank forms of these certificates shall be furnished by the commissioner of labor to the superintendent of schools in the respective cities and counties. A duplicate copy of each certificate shall be filed with the commissioner of labor within four days from its issuance. The commissioner of labor may at any time revoke any certificate if, in his judgment, the certificate was improperly issued. He is authorized to investigate the true age of any child employed, hear evidence, and require the production of relevant books or documents. If the certificate is revoked, the then employer shall be notified, and said child shall not thereafter be employed or permitted to labor until a new certificate has been legally obtained, except that the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be applicable in instances specified and provided for in section 8 of this act.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that no child under 14 years and 6 months of age shall be permitted to work in or about any of the establishments mentioned in section 1 or section 2 of this act between the hours of 7 p. m. and 6 a. m., according to the standard time of the community in which such establishment is located.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that it shall be the duty of the commissioner of labor and his authorized assistants to see that the provisions of this act are enforced.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that any person, agent, or representative of any firm or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act, or any parent, guardian, or other person standing in parental relationship to any child, who shall hire or place for employment or labor any child under the age limits in any of the establishments or occupations mentioned in section 1 of this act, or any superintendent of county or city schools who shall issue a certificate knowing that its issuance was illegal; or any person who shall knowingly furnish any untrue evidence with reference to the date or place of birth of said child, or the age of said child, or its educational qualifications, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished accordingly.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the act approved August 1, 1906, and entitled "An act to regulate the employment of children in factories and manufacturing establishments in this State and to provide for the punishment of violations of the regulations prescribed and for other purposes and codified in sections 3143 to 3149 inclusive, of the Code of Georgia of 1910, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that it shall be lawful for a child 12 years of age or more to work in and for a mill, factory, laundry, manufacturing establishment, or place of amusement if such child has dependent upon his labor a widowed mother or if such child is an orphan dependent upon his own labor. Whenever such child desires to work in any of such places as is specified above the fact that such child's labor is necessary to support a widowed mother or to support such orphan child must be found to be true after an investigation by a commission composed of the county school superintendent and the ordinary of the county where the work is to be done, and the head of the school in the school district where the said child lives. After an investigation by said commission if it, or a majority of its members, find that the facts exist to authorize such child to work in or for any of the establishments mentioned in section 1 of this act, because of the existence of either of the conditions hereinbefore set out, such commission shall issue a certificate to that effect which shall be kept on file in the office of the establishment where said child is at work. Such commission shall make an investigation and issue a new certificate at least once each six months and may prescribe as a condition precedent to issuance of such certificate school attendance for such length of time and at such time as in its discretion seems wise. No such certificate more than six months old should authorize the employment of any child under 14½ years of age in or for any of the places specified in section 1 of this act.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in a very able and carefully considered speech delivered on this floor on the 26th day of February of this year, and a speech that in my opinion does him great credit as a lawyer, because it is one of the few close-knit, real arguments on the other side that I have had the opportunity to read on this question, the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] made this remark, almost at the conclusion of his great speech:

Now, Mr. President, I have taken a great deal more time than I should have done. I do not know, if Congress has a doubt about the constitutionality of a proposed legislative enactment, just what its duty is. That is for each Member to determine.

By the way, the very able and very candid Senator from Iowa expressed what I regarded as a doubt in his own mind on that very subject.

He continued:

It is a principle of constitutional law, however, that all legislation, whether of Congress or of the States, must be taken to be valid unless the contrary is clearly shown. Of course, when a law comes before a court for interpretation it is to a certain extent limited by the fact that every presumption is in favor of constitutionality. Hence Congress should carefully consider constitutional questions. But it does seem to me that a mere question in one's mind as to whether or not a court may hold a statute unconstitutional is not enough to warrant voting against a measure even where it may fairly be said to be a somewhat doubtful question.

The Senator from Iowa expressed in those words a view that is all too prevalent, especially among careless and inexperienced legislators. You often hear discussions in the cloakrooms, and sometimes upon the floors of both Houses of Congress, in which Senators and Representatives express themselves about in this way: "Well, I am very doubtful about the constitutionality of this legislation; but, after all, the courts must construe it. Therefore I am going to vote for it and let its constitutionality be decided by the courts."

The Senator from Iowa, expressing this view with some qualifications that do him credit, although unfortunately he did not get away from the substantial ground that this class of legislators occupy, has, in my judgment, called attention to what is one of the most serious dangers in our whole constitutional system. He has adverted to what has become a common practice, unfortunately, among too many Members of both Houses of Congress, and even some of them good lawyers like my friend from Iowa. On the contrary, I say to my friend that the very reverse of his proposition is true; that the very opposite of his position is the true and statesmanlike ground, and the only ground that a legislator who understands the American constitutional system can afford to occupy or can safely stand upon. Since the courts give every doubt in favor of the constitutionality of legislation, for that very reason it is the solemn, bounden duty of legislators to resolve every doubt against the constitutionality of measures.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator—

Mr. HARDWICK. It will not interrupt me at all.

Mr. KENYON. But if the principle the Senator lays down had been followed, we would have had no employers' liability act, no pure food and drugs act, and certainly no white-slave act, would we?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, it depends. I will answer the Senator candidly—

Mr. KENYON. In all of those, I think—if the Senator will follow the briefs in those cases, as he probably has done, and as I have done—the same argument was made as to the constitutional questions.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to discuss each one of those cases before I get through. Of course, legislation of that character—most of it, at least—never could have gotten the support of the Senator from Georgia, and did not get it, because I was utterly unable to decide that the legislation was constitutional.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Georgia would have contended, I assume, that the white-slave act was unconstitutional?

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought so, and voted against it for that reason. That is my recollection of my record.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Under that rule we never would have had any United States bank, either.

Mr. HARDWICK. And if you do not adopt that rule you will not have any States very much longer, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH. And if we never had had any United States bank we never would have had any national banking system.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, it depends. In answering the Senator's question, I think I will touch the thought the Senator has in mind. It depends. Legislators, of course, who have no reasonable doubt—I am going to interpolate the word "reasonable" there—will not hesitate to support legislation of that character; or, if there is grave doubt in the minds of a majority that it can be constitutionally enacted, then, if the legislation is indispensable, there must be some amendment of the Constitution, as we have done about the election of Senators, the levying of an income tax, and such questions as that. The Senator's position that if you are in doubt you should resolve the doubt against your scruples on constitutional matters is in my judgment not only inherently unsound, but is as dangerous a doctrine as was ever announced in the American Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say that the rule by which one should be guided in voting for a bill or against it, when the constitutionality of it was involved, was this—that if the Senator has a doubt as to its constitutionality, he should vote against it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, a serious doubt. I do not mean a trivial doubt. I am using the word in its ordinary significance. I mean a real, substantial doubt.

Mr. BORAH. A substantial doubt. Of course, if it is a well-grounded doubt, a well-founded one, that might be true; but if the Supreme Court seems to have announced principles under which the law could be sustained, and has taken a position which would make it constitutional as you interpret it, and if you believe the measure to be a beneficent measure, a good measure, would the Senator still resolve his own individual doubts against the law?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; and the Senator from Idaho would, too, if he will face this question squarely, because it is not right, it is not just, it is not honest, to substitute for my judgment as a Senator from Georgia and a Member of this body the judgment of any other man on this earth. I was sent here by 3,000,000 people to discharge my duty to them according to my own mentality; and so with the Senator from Idaho, and so with every other Member of this body. Every legislator is just as much the guardian, the conservator, the preserver of the Constitution of his country, which he has sworn to support, as any judge can possibly be. Every legislator must act independently, on his own honest judgment. Courts have been known to reverse themselves. If the Senator adopts any such convenient system of "doubts" as he suggests, he might find himself in the place of the man who did not know anything but statute law, and the legislature came along and repealed all that he knew. [Laughter.] He might find the courts jumping so fast that a stable, well-balanced, well-grounded gentleman of the Senator's type and caliber would not be able to jump with them. Courts are constantly reversing themselves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I accept the proposition, under our theory of government, that when the Constitution of the United States is construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, that is my guide, whether prior to the decision it would have been my judgment or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true. I am going to agree with the Senator that far, when it is plainly, clearly ruled, and there is no escape from the ruling. But in the region of doubt, where it is uncertain how far the tendency has proceeded, where it is uncertain whether the particular question which the Senator as a legislator would pass upon has been decided or not, there can be no such doctrine soundly applied. Am I not right?

Mr. BORAH. I will respond to the Senator in a minute.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, in support of the position he is taking, that many of the great lawyers of this country who lived contemporarily with the adoption of the Constitution felt that the Congress ought to be, in the matter of construing the Constitution, the court of last resort.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes. Not only that—

Mr. CLAPP. But it is not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not only that but the Senator knows that the framers of the Constitution did not at all intend that the Supreme Court should declare acts of Congress unconstitutional.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; the Senator does not know that at all. The Senator entertains quite the opposite view.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator ought to have found it out by this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator dispute that proposition?

Mr. BORAH. If I understood the Senator correctly, I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Probably I did not express myself clearly. I said that the Constitutional Convention did not intend to confer the power that the Supreme Court has since assumed, to declare invalid or unconstitutional an act of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, I do not at all agree with that doctrine. Both historically and according to the terms of the Constitution I reject the doctrine.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator knows the warrant and authority for it, anyway. I will not go into a side issue of that kind at this time. There is ample warrant and authority for the statement I have made.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that; I would not say "ample."

Mr. CLAPP. The Constitutional Convention refused on two votes to confer such a power on that court.

Mr. BORAH. That is all right. The great framers of the Constitution—Mr. Madison, whom the Senator has cited; Mr. Hamilton, and that class of men—expressed themselves beyond question in favor of the proposition that the Supreme Court of the United States could do precisely what Chief Justice Marshall finally said it should do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and the Constitutional Convention that framed the Constitution twice voted, unless my memory is inaccurate, that they would confer no such power.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Constitutional Convention did not, in my opinion, decide that precise question by a vote at all. That was not the precise question which was before them when they took the vote. I have undertaken to analyze the opinion of the members of the Constitutional Convention; and many of the leading members of it, the men who will be recalled to us now as being the framers of the Constitution, announced themselves in favor of the doctrine that the Supreme Court of the United States could declare a statute unconstitutional.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator knows the authority for the position I have taken. It is ample. He may not agree with it, but the fact remains that votes were taken that, in my judgment—I will put them in the Record at some time when I have more time than this—mean absolutely that. Furthermore, I want to suggest to the Senator that it is not the part of brave, honorable, honest statesmanship to shift responsibility. I know the Senator will agree with me about that. We have our responsibility.

Mr. BORAH. I agree perfectly with the Senator as to the proposition of not shifting responsibility; but I want to go back for a moment to a time long prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1787. In at least several of the States the courts of last resort had laid down the doctrine, which afterwards came to be the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, that a court of last resort must necessarily declare a statute unconstitutional when it came in conflict with the Constitution. That was an established principle in American courts at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. In two States.

Mr. BORAH. In more than two, I think.

Mr. CLAPP. No; only two.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I think he is in error. I know that a distinguished professor has lately written a book in which he has undertaken to prove that the Supreme Court of the United States pulled that doctrine out of their minds and said it was a new proposition at the time it was announced by the Supreme Court of the United States. A more fallacious, disingenuous interpretation of the history of our country was never advanced by a learned professor. Courts of last resort in the States had laid down a different doctrine, and the leading members of the Constitutional Convention had also announced the same doctrine, and announced it in the Constitutional Convention.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is bootless to engage in a controversy about a matter that I must concede is now finally settled.

Mr. CLAPP. Chief Justice Marshall did not refer to any decisions.

Mr. BORAH. Chief Justice Marshall wrote opinion after opinion and never referred to any decisions; but the fact remains, nevertheless, that the decisions are in existence.

Mr. CLAPP. Two of them.

Mr. BORAH. All you have to do is to send to the Library to get them.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORAH. They are remarkably reasoned, and sustained by argument.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, undoubtedly. The Senator from Georgia is familiar with those decisions, if he may say so without any claim to too great knowledge of the law. He is familiar with those decisions; and it is bootless to pursue, especially as I want to conclude as early as I can, so largely theoretical a controversy as this is at the present time. At some other time, if we have more time, I shall be glad to engage the Senator from Idaho on that, and present to him in detail the reasons and authorities on which I base my opinion that the Constitutional Convention did not intend to confer on the Supreme Court of the United States the power to declare unconstitutional the acts of Congress. Be that as it may, they have assumed that power. They have sustained it, as the Senator says, in powerfully reasoned opinions, and it is no longer a matter of controversy among good lawyers or among legislators. But in no respectable quarter has the doctrine been advanced that Members of Congress of either the House or the Senate can shield themselves behind the Supreme Court and shelve off on the Supreme Court their responsibilities to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against its enemies, foreign and domestic, and to observe and comply with its limitations and requirements.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the Supreme Court having established the doctrine that it is the final tribunal to determine the constitutionality of a question, is there not danger that a Senator, by giving too much force to his doubt, may deprive the public and the proponents of a measure of an opportunity to get the determination of that final tribunal as to the constitutionality of a proposed law? It seems to me we should guard against that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so, Mr. President. The duty of a legislature in respect to this question is just as important, just as vital, just as functional, as any ever imposed on any court. It is a part of the necessary functions of our Government that the legislative body itself shall determine for itself while it is engaged in the lawmaking business the limitation of the constitutional power. The Supreme Court raises that question when it comes to the business of construing the law that the legislature has enacted.

From the first I realized that this contention of mine was liable to bring about just the sort of rejoinders from Senators and others who will not shoulder their responsibilities, but who go on and say, "After all, I do not know whether it is constitutional or not, and we will leave it to the court to decide."

I did not want to rest entirely on my own opinion; I think it would not carry enough weight with the Senate; so, in support of the view I have advanced, I have here the greatest constitutional authority that ever dealt with the Constitution of the United States, and I commend it to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Idaho as well. In Cooley on Constitutional Law, third edition, pages 171 and 172, Judge Cooley said:

A doubt of the constitutional validity of a statute is never sufficient to warrant its being set aside.

He is speaking of the court there, as we will see later.

It is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the Judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other. It is but a decent respect due to the wisdom, the integrity, and the patriotism of the legislative body by which any law is passed to presume in favor of its validity until its violation of the Constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt. To be in doubt, therefore, is to be resolved, and the resolution must support the law.

That was as far as concerns the court. But listen to this:

This course is the opposite to that which is required of the legislature in considering the question of passing a proposed law. Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution. They are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business—

I commend this opinion to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] also. Judge Cooley continues:

A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy. A witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support.

Judge Cooley is right. That is sound; it is sound law; it is sound morals, if I am any judge of correct principles.

This business of saying, "Oh, well, I do not know exactly what can be done; it is very doubtful, and I will leave it to somebody else," when you have sworn that you will obey and support the Constitution of the United States, is not performing the duties Senators and Representatives owe to their constituencies, to themselves, and to their own oaths.

Mr. President, having laid down that premise as to the duty of a legislator I wish to discuss in as condensed a form as I can some of the legal questions involved in this measure and raised by it.

Let me say, Mr. President, very frankly that I am utterly without hope that anything I can do or say to-day, or that any other Senator can do or say here to-day, will alter or affect the result, so far as the Senate is concerned. I say it with a feeling of profound sadness, for, Senators, I am sorry that the time has not come—has not come again would be the right way to put it—when we can do as our fathers did, as our illustrious predecessors in this Chamber did in days that are gone, and without regard to the advantages of party politics, without regard to making popular appeals for something that seems to be popular for the moment, do our duty as Senators of the United States under the oath of office we have taken and under the Constitution of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. That was before we had a program mapped out.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator suggests it was before we had a program. There is force in that. One party is as guilty as another in that respect, and all have been too guilty.

Oh, that the day of legislative independence in this country would return! Oh, that we could have Senators who would stand before the people of this country like Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Hill, and all the great Senators of the past, who had profound convictions that they stood by regardless of results! If the Senate has lost in popular estimation, if the Senate does not stand as highly as it ought to stand in the opinion of the people of the United States, then, Senators, I regret to say it, but the Senate itself is to blame. Sitting in the seat that Robert Toombs has filled, that Ben Hill has filled, representing the 3,000,000 people of the State of Georgia, I have determined that, as far as I am concerned, whatever may be the political or personal result, I am going to live up to my duty as a Senator of the United States so long as I serve in this body.

I am afraid that we yield too much to political considerations. I am afraid we think too much about what some possible or imaginary opponent may say about us when he goes on the stump against us in some campaign of the future. But it is one of the perils and one of the shortcomings of our American system of government that our fathers did not have quite so much trouble with, although I suppose they had enough politics in that time also; but it is one that has given us a great deal of concern and trouble. I served some seven terms in the House of Representatives before the people of Georgia elected me to fill the seat of the late Senator Bacon, upon the occasion of his untimely death.

I can tell you as the result of a legislative experience in both Houses of Congress extending through some 16 years or more that my own judgment is that we would have far better legislation and the public interests would be far better subserved if neither the President of the United States nor any Member of either House of Congress were ever eligible for reelection. We would have some inexperienced work of course, and Congress would make some mistakes, but there are plenty of men in all the States who could fill our places as well, if not better, than we do—at least, in my State I know that is true. If the temptation to intrigue for political success, if the temptation to so vote as to give you votes in the primary or votes in the election were removed, I have so high an opinion of the intelligence and integrity of this body and the other body of Congress that I know the American people would get vastly better legislation and a great deal less demagoguery. That is the plain, sober truth on that proposition, I believe.

Mr. President, it is contended that the proposed legislation is constitutional because it is within the limit of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce between the several States, with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes. I utterly dissent from that contention. Remembering that our Government is a government of delegated powers and can exercise no power except a power expressly given it by the Constitution or necessarily implied from some express power, remembering that the Constitution of this country was framed in order to make commerce between the States free and unhampered, remembering that the primary purpose, in a material way at least, of the Constitution was to unhamper and unchain commerce between the States, to make it free to go from one end of this country to the other without discrimination, favoritism, or local burden, it is hard for me to assent at all to any of this newfangled doctrine of prohibiting commerce between the States, which has sprung up on this subject in recent years, although I think I can demonstrate to the Senate and to any court in this country that this case itself can be clearly differentiated from any decision on that subject that has ever yet been rendered by any respectable court in the United States of America.

The first case to which I refer, and I am going to read from it only briefly to lay down only one substantive proposition, is the case of Coe against Errol, reported in One hundred and sixteenth United States, page 578. Without reading at length from the opinion, because the opinion does not do more than substantiate the principle announced in the reporter's headnotes, I want to read the third headnote of this decision:

When goods, the product of a State, have begun to be transported from that State to another State, and not till then, they have become the subjects of interstate commerce, and, as such, are subject to national regulation and cease to be taxable by the State of their origin.

That is an old case, but it is a sound one.

Again—and again without elaboration—I read from the Daniel Ball case, decided in 1870 and reported in Tenth Wallace, page 557. The Supreme Court said, as given in the seventh headnote:

She was employed as an instrument of that commerce—

That is, commerce between the States—

She was employed as an instrument of that commerce; for whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one State to another commerce in that commodity between the States has commenced.

Mr. President, I am going to read next from an opinion in one of the leading cases in the entire jurisprudence of the United States. It ought to have great persuasive weight with this body, not only for its own inherent soundness, not only for its own intrinsic strength, but because the distinguished jurist who wrote it was one of the most brilliant ornaments of this great body for many years, a great American statesman as well as a jurist. I refer to former Justice L. Q. C. Lamar, from Mississippi, and to the well-known case of Kidd against Pearson. This decision, in my judgment, is the greatest monument to Justice Lamar that he left behind him in his whole public service, whether as a legislator or as a jurist. It is the one great case that stands out among the cases that he decided like some great mountain above the surrounding country. Justice Lamar said in his decision, rendered in 1888 (Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S., pp. 20, 21, 22):

No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term, as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 702) is as follows: "Commerce with foreign countries, and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future—

And yet that is the precise contention that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas now makes in this case—it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing.

Take your wheat in the West, and if you worked over eight hours a day they might not let you ship it from one State to another or to a foreign country. It would be that or worse about our cotton.

The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South, plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

It is not necessary to enlarge on, but only to suggest the impracticability of such a scheme, when we regard the multitudinous affairs involved, and the almost infinite variety of their minute details.

It was said by Chief Justice Marshall, that it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation. See also County of Mobile v. Kimball, supra, at page 697.

This being true, how can it further that object so as to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicated? The demands of such a supervision would require, not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question—

That is, the interstate-commerce clause.

Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for, Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market. These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen; but still there would always remain the possibility, and often it would be the case, that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State; and the interminable trouble would be presented, that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined, not by any general or intelligible rule, but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments, and more provocative of conflicts between the General Government and the States, and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended, it would be difficult to imagine.

I am going to read next from the case of the United States against E. C. Knight Co. Before I read, briefly, from that decision I want to reply to an observation made by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. The junior Senator from Iowa seems to think this was a very discreditable decision and that it was not the law of the land; that the minority opinion was the sound rule that has since been followed. I think it has not been demonstrated by the junior Senator from Iowa that such is not the case. I suppose he objected to it because the Supreme Court decided that even a trust could not be lynched without regard to the Constitution; that you must lynch it constitutionally while you are at it. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] seemed to think that because the Supreme Court held that the Constitution protected even a "trust" it is a discredited case. I have a very high regard for that Senator, but I hardly think he would want to put himself permanently in that position. The decision, in my judgment, is sound, it has never been overruled, and why the Senator will say it was "discredited" because it held something he did not believe in is more than I can understand. I read from the body of the opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, and there have been few abler lawyers on that bench than Mr. Chief Justice Fuller; I think that fact is conceded. I am not going to read very much of it, but it is sound law and it has never been reversed, and it is the law of the land to-day:

The argument is that the power to control the manufacture of refined sugar is a monopoly over a necessary of life, to the enjoyment of which by a large part of the population of the United States interstate commerce is indispensable, and that, therefore, the General Government in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce may repress such monopoly directly and set aside the instruments which have created it. But this argument can not be confined to necessities of life merely, and must include all articles of general consumption.

The "necessaries of life" argument did not seem to appeal very much to the legal mind of the Chief Justice. The opinion continues:

Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not the primary sense; and although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture and is not a part of it. The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce.

It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power, and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run, in the effort to suppress them, of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

Then the Chief Justice cites a number of opinions sustaining that proposition—

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator remember how many judges dissented in that case?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think there were three. I will turn to it.

Mr. KENYON. There was a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; there is a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan. I will give the Senator the information in just a minute. Justice Harlan read the dissenting opinion. My memory was inaccurate about it. He was the only Justice who dissented as near as I can tell from a hasty examination of the case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the senior Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia rather an abstract question. He has appealed very eloquently and very strongly to the consciences of Senators in determining whether they shall vote for or against a law the constitutionality of which is questioned.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the constitutionality of which is doubted by the Senator himself.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, that brings it right to the point of my question.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the way I would state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator recognize the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as settling for Senators the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, or ought each Senator to apply or interpret the Constitution according to his original reasoning?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator, Mr. President, of course, asks a very profound question; one that it is difficult for me to answer offhand. I can give him, however, my own views about it. I have given some thought to the subject, and I admit I regard it as more of a moral question than anything else.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is an ethical question.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe that the decisions of the courts—the doctrine of stare decisis—is binding only upon litigants. The business of the courts is not to make—although they sometimes seem to do it—laws, but to construe them. Their decisions are binding upon the great world of business and upon everybody within the jurisdiction of the court as to the meaning, construction, and intent of those laws; but it seems to me that each legislator is bound to apply his own judgment as to what the Constitution of the United States means, and not to shift that responsibility to any judge, living or dead; to do what he thinks is right, provided his conviction is so profound, so fixed, that it does not yield to the persuasive influence of the logic and the reasoning of the court's decision. Now, I have answered the question so far as I can.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has made a very plain answer.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am not going to read at any length from the so-called Lottery case—Champion against Ames—but there are merely one or two observations which I want to make about that case.

In the first place, I am glad that just as I was about to take up that case the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] propounded the question which he did. I have never believed the decision in that case was sound law. I have never seen the day when I felt like I had not enough doubt as to the soundness of the decision to refrain from embracing any of the doctrines that it establishes. I expect to be able to show the Senate later the evils that would flow from the principle laid down in the Lottery case. It was the beginning of all of our troubles on this subject, as the Senator knows, that in order to suppress one evil the Congress made this mistake, adopted this doubtful constitutional expedient, and got involved in all the morass of all these various other usurpations of power that Senators now cite as authority for this outrage, which simply shows how one wrong step leads to another and to many more; how when you have made one mistake it is difficult ever to retrace your way. I am afraid that if the Senator—assuming that he is for this bill—and other Senators who favor this bill have their way and pass this bill, in the years to come they will be just as sorry as I am that the lottery decision was rendered, and that they contributed to the taking of another step which of and in itself amounted to little, so far as child labor itself is concerned, but which, by a deliberate abandonment of fundamental principles, contributed to the overthrow of all local self-government in this court. Against this danger it seems that the Supreme Court only can protect us, and I firmly believe it will do so.

Now, let us see. The language both of the House bill and of the Senate committee amendment, as I said in my opening remarks, is based somewhat on the language of the lottery statute, because the language of the bill is that any man who "offers to ship a lottery ticket in interstate commerce." Of course, the Senate committee amendment, barring the points of difference that have been already pointed out by both the Senator from Arkansas and myself, has the same scheme or plan of structure. It is evident that the lottery statute was drawn in that way. I have not taken the trouble to go back to the lottery statute to verify it, but the court says this in its opinion in the Lottery case:

But it is said that the statute in question—

That is, the lottery statute—

does not regulate the carrying of lottery tickets—

That is, the tickets themselves—from State to State, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress in effect prohibits such carrying; that in respect of the carrying from one State to another of articles or things that are, in fact, according to usage in business, the subjects of commerce, the authority given Congress was not to prohibit but only to regulate.

It is apparent there that Congress adopted the same sort of a draft as the House proposed here; they punished people who undertook to ship through interstate commerce lottery tickets, just as the Senator proposes to do in this case, although, as I pointed out this morning, they did not punish the man who caused the lottery tickets to be printed for sending Sunday school tracts or Bibles that happened to be published in the same establishment in which the lottery tickets were printed. The committee amendment, however, has gone that far, and that is going some. The decision continues:

If a State, when considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits, may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money in that mode, why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another? In this connection it must not be forgotten that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States is plenary, is complete in itself—

Following the language of the old decisions—and is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution. What provision in that instrument can be regarded as limiting the exercise of the power granted? What clause can be cited which in any degree countenances the suggestion that one may of right carry or cause to be carried from one State to another that which will harm the public morals? We can not think of any clause of that instrument that could possibly be invoked by those who assert their right to send lottery tickets from State to State, except the one providing that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. We have said that the liberty protected by the Constitution embraces the right to be free in the enjoyment of one's faculties, "to be free to use them in all lawful ways."

That is, to live and work where he will and to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling or in any lawful way according to the laws of the community in which he resides.

I am not going to comment at length on this Lottery case. I want to point out that, however, and when that is stated I think the strongest thing has been said that can be said in answer to the various arguments and reasonings which are sought to be adduced from this Lottery case.

The court sustained the lottery statute on the ground that the lottery ticket itself was a part of the gambling paraphernalia; that it was a part and parcel of the system and scheme by which men gambled. Even the meager part of the opinion I have read shows on this theory—and I am going back to the Lottery case in just a moment—that since the power to regulate interstate commerce was given to Congress by the Constitution, the power to regulate it was taken from the States; and that therefore no State could protect itself by State law, by State authority, against the introduction within its borders of noxious products, of immoral and unsound articles. That is a distinction and difference that I am going to elaborate later. Senators know how the distinguished jurist rendering that opinion labored and labored, giving one excuse after another for it, trying to draw one fine-spun distinction after another, and that he finally said, "This decision is not to be taken as a precedent for anything; we are merely deciding about gambling now, and we do not know what the decision will be when we come to something else." I know my friend the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is going to comment at length on that decision, so I shall not take up any more time with it.

In the case of Adair v. United States (208 U. S., 161) it was held that—

The power to regulate commerce, while great and paramount, can not be exerted in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the National Constitution.

Probably within the principle announced by that decision lies the answer of such men as my friend from Iowa, to the proposition that it would be possible under the precedents made by legislation of this character for Congress arbitrarily to exclude from the channels of interstate commerce perfectly sound wheat, perfectly sound cotton, because of some whim that it might have on the subject or because of some reason which might honestly and really seem good to Congress.

Senators of that type say that the legislator that undertakes to do that will be confronted by the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that he will find that he is depriving people of their property without due process of law, and that, construing the two sections of the Constitution of the United States in pari materia, both must be given effect, and that Congress can not be allowed to violate the fifth amendment in its regulation of commerce.

Now, I want to ask Senators who make that contention, if the article of commerce is inherently sound, if it is not unlawful in character, if it is a legitimate thing, if it is a piece of cotton goods, if you want to have cotton manufactures in mind, or a piece of woolen goods, if you want to think about the woolen mills—whatever it is into which labor has entered—if it is in and of itself sound and not deleterious, if it can do no harm to the consumer, why is it not true, by every principle laid down in the Adair case, that every protection given by the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States does not obtain with full force and vigor to control and limit the legislative power of the Congress?

Mr. President, I am not going to go through the decisions in all the cases which have been referred to; but in Hipolite Egg Co. against The United States, in Two hundred and twentieth United States, the pure-food law was sustained; but I point out to the Senate that in that case the articles themselves were inherently unsound and were in themselves deleterious. That is the vital difference between cases of that character and the proposed child-labor legislation; there is nothing wrong with the product of child labor, and it will do no harm in any State when it enters consumption; it will defraud nobody; it will cheat nobody; it will hurt nobody in any way, so far as the article itself and its sale and consumption are concerned. Therefore this is utterly different from any case cited by the distinguished Senators who hold the affirmative of this issue. The same thing is true in the case of the United States against The Lexington Mill & Elevator Co., decided in Two hundred and thirty-ninth United States.

In the case of Coppage against the United States, in Two hundred and thirty-sixth United States—

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator goes to the case he has just cited, I should like his opinion upon this matter: He has spoken about woolen goods and cotton goods both being sound, as they are. Does the Senator believe that we could pass a law which would prevent the shipment in interstate commerce of goods composed of cotton and wool without a label upon them?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, the Senator has misbranding legislation in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have no such legislation as yet, I think.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; we have had "misbranding" legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Could we pass a law prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of such goods without a label upon them showing the proportion of cotton and the proportion of wool? I suggest that, because a mixed product of that sort is just as sound and just as useful and much more common than either wool or cotton unadulterated.

Mr. HARDWICK. When I come to answer the question laid down by the Senator's colleague I will show what I think is the difference on that point. The desire in that case is to protect the consumer against misrepresentation, against being defrauded, against being cheated, which the State can not do, because it can not stop the shipment of such goods in interstate commerce; certainly not in the original package before delivery to the consignee; and, therefore, the Federal Government, the court holds, has a sort of a police power to exclude from interstate commerce unsound or illegitimate articles.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it is a legitimate object of commerce. It is a commodity or article of commerce which everybody recognizes, and that means this—and I should like the Senator to answer me if it be not so—that we can use the power to regulate commerce or the authority to regulate commerce in order to protect or inform people as to the contents of an article or a commodity which is perfectly sound and absolutely innocent.

Mr. HARDWICK. I say to the Senator very frankly that I do not believe we have any such power, if the article itself is sound, wholesome, and legitimate in character.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was sure the Senator would reach that conclusion—

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is my opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because it is logical.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I can draw a distinction, as I will show the Senator in just a moment, and a very pertinent distinction, between that question and the one involved in the pending bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not asserting that they are exactly parallel.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will give the Senator the exact parallel and apply it to the given case. If that legislation is held constitutional, then undoubtedly it would be within the power of Congress, according to the decisions of the court, to say that articles produced by child labor and convict-made goods, in the same way, could not be transported through the agencies of interstate commerce unless they were so branded. That would be as far as that principle could be stretched; but I will not go into that, because I do not believe that that is sound. I do not think there is a doubt that it is not sound.

From the Copeage case I will read from one of the notes of the reporter—and the opinion bears it out exactly. Senators will remember that the Copeage case was a case in which they denied the right of the Legislature of Kansas, under the fourteenth amendment, to prohibit a man from joining a labor union. The Kansas law was upheld in the lower court, but the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the lower court. It was contended in behalf of that statute that a sound public policy fully authorized and fully justified such an enactment. On that contention the court said:

Since a State may not strike down the rights of liberty or property directly, it may not do so indirectly.

Has Congress different power than the State in that respect? It has been asserted here that Congress has a perfect right, not only constitutionally, but morally, to do something indirectly that it has no pretension of right to do directly. I utterly dispute both propositions. The Supreme Court of the United States says a State can not do it. I quote again from the Copeage case:

Since a State may not strike down the rights of liberty or property directly, it may not do so indirectly, as by declaring in effect that the public good requires the removal of those inequalities that are but the normal and inevitable result of the exercise of those rights, and then invoking the police power in order to remove the inequalities, without other object in view.

I am not going into the details of all of these decisions, but in the case of Weber against Freed, to which some of the Senators have referred, decided December 6, 1915, it was held that Congress had the power to prohibit any foreign importation, but to a lawyer the difference is so manifest and so wide, that I do not think I will dwell on it at all.

The power of Congress over interstate commerce and over foreign commerce is contained in the same clause of the Constitution and in the same words; but, because of its sovereignty as a nation, and because there are no other clauses in the Constitution itself which modify the power with respect to foreign commerce, that power is absolute and is not limited by any other power in the Constitution. The exact reverse is true with respect to interstate commerce. Not only are the reserved powers of the State under the tenth amendment to the Constitution and the due process of law amendment, known as the fifth amendment, limitations upon the interstate-commerce power, but it seems to me there can be no serious dispute on the question of the distinction between the power of Congress with respect to foreign commerce and its power with respect to commerce between the States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not say that there is no difference; but the Senator from Georgia does not mean to say, I am sure, that the fifth amendment to the Constitution does not apply to or limit the power of Congress in dealing with foreign commerce?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; I do not think it does. That is my contention. It might in behalf of a citizen of the United States, but certainly it does not in behalf of a citizen of a foreign government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not—

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what I meant to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all the fifth amendment applies to anyhow—a citizen of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know; but I say the power to forbid importations, so far as its exercise affects a person who is not a citizen of the United States, is absolutely uncontrolled and uninfluenced by anything else.

Mr. CUMMINS. I quite agree to that; but so far as a citizen of the United States is concerned—

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; the fifth amendment would apply equally in the one case as in the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would apply in respect to foreign commerce as well as interstate commerce.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly. I am glad the Senator does not misunderstand me about that. It is exactly the same if the rights of citizens are involved in either case; but it is very different if the rights of citizens of the United States are not involved in the question of foreign importations. So much for that distinction.

There are two cases in the books, fairly recent cases, which, in my judgment, absolutely show what the temper and the trend of the recent Supreme Court decisions are. They construe the lottery decision, and one of them especially lays down as clear as the sunlight the rule of law as applicable to this case, and unmistakably defines the limits of constitutional power.

In the case of Hoke against United States, decided in Two hundred and twenty-seventh United States, on February 24, 1913, the court in a very labored decision, undertaking to show that the Congress was supplementing the police powers and the local activities of the several States and local communities, held the white-slave law constitutional. It was held constitutional on the theory, when you boil the opinion down, that because when the woman arrives at a given point, her destination, one of the results and purposes of her importation from one State into another, is an intended violation of the criminal laws of the State into which she is imported. It was, therefore, held in that case that Congress had the power to say that the agencies of interstate commerce should not be employed to bring people into a State for the purpose of violating the laws of that State when they arrived there. That is a very roundabout, tortuous, and unsatisfactory decision, to my mind, and yet that is finally what the principle of the opinion is based upon. I call the attention of Senators again to the fact that the court claims that Congress has the right to protect the citizens of a State from the importation of articles, or persons even, that will be injurious to them, because the States can not stop such importation at all under State law unless Congress shall intervene and do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me an interruption?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In that case the person transported was being transported for an immoral purpose, and the person transported was an immoral person.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, what possible difference could that make? It simply emphasizes the fact that the Supreme Court undertook to invoke the police power under the commerce clause.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, perhaps I did not make myself plain.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has been making a splendid argument. I am not complaining of that.

Mr. HARDWICK. This is what I meant, if the Senator will let me repeat it. I meant that in every one of these cases where the court have upheld such statutes, they have simply done so because they say that Congress must have the power to protect a State from the importation into her borders or limits of articles through interstate commerce, the State itself being powerless to do it, that are injurious to her health or morals. That is the doctrine, as I understand it. I do not think it is sound, but that is the principle on which it rests.

I think I can come to this matter in a different way by answering a question propounded by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] in his speech the other day. In that speech the junior Senator from Iowa said this:

Those in support of a national child-labor law, however, do not need to go to the extreme of Senator Beveridge's position. There is very late authority for the doctrine that if the carrying of certain articles in interstate commerce results in a use of those articles deleterious to public welfare Congress has the right to prohibit such transportation. These authorities go so far as the consideration of the question of the use by the consumer. I will agree that they do not go to the question of the production, and that is the only difference in the contention for a national child-labor law.

Now, take it and confine it to consumption. Congress exercises the power to protect a State against the importation of something which when introduced into consumption within its borders or limits is dangerous to public health, to public safety, or to public morals, on the theory and for the reason that the State is utterly helpless—it having delegated to the General Government, in common with the other States which form the American Union, its power over interstate commerce—to prevent the importation of such dangerous or unwholesome or unsound products; and on that theory every one of these cases, except, possibly, the misbranding cases, to which the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] referred just now, rests, in my judgment. But when it comes to production it is different. What does it matter to the people of the Senator's State, the people of Iowa, as far as their own material well-being is concerned, as far as their own safety is concerned, as far as their own comfort is concerned, whether children work in Georgia or in North Carolina or in Florida? The article we send you is sound. It will not kill you. It will not hurt you. It will not cause the commission of crime. It will do you no harm; but if anybody is harmed, it is us, in its production.

The Senator sees the line I am trying to draw. You have nothing to do with that. That is local self-government. Our people at home, and each State in this American Republic, know, or ought to know, best what they want to do with their own and for their own; and so long as they do not injure other States or the people of other States, they have the exclusive right to determine their own policy.

I hope I have made my position plain. That is the point I have been trying to make in all this discussion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. So far as the white-slave act was concerned, the enforcement of the law could be as thoroughly left to the State as the control of the child-labor law.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. BORAH. If the parties are brought into the State for evil purposes, they are within the State. They can be prosecuted under the criminal law. They can be taken charge of by the criminal law. They are completely within the control of the State.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, I think the Senator is right in that matter. I voted against that bill just for that reason. I had no earthly idea that it was constitutional, and, of course, the apt rejoinder would be—I have been expecting it here all day—that I may be equally mistaken about this, which is quite conceivable.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the Supreme Court did not lay down the rule that it did in the white-slave case because the persons were being imported into the State and the State was helpless to protect itself, but on the broader ground that the National Government could deny the channels of interstate trade to any immoral purpose or immoral practice or anything which was deemed to be contrary to the good morals or health of the people.

Mr. HARDWICK. At the present time I am not going to undertake to go into that in detail. I got the other idea very strongly from some of the expressions in the opinion—that they were going to aid the State authorities, but they rather begged the question by saying, "We are not in conflict in this matter"—the Senator remembers that part of the decision, I am sure—"with the local police authorities. We are helping them. We are aiding them. We are supplementing them in what we do." I admit that it is all as weak as water, according to my opinion; but still that is the theory on which they put it.

Now, let us see. I do think, however, that there is one decision—and I hope I will have the attention of the Senator from Idaho, particularly with reference to that case—which points out very plainly the difference between what can be done and what can not be done under these decisions and where the line of demarcation is to be drawn.

At the October term, 1912, the case of McDermott v. The State of Wisconsin (228 U. S., 115) came on to be argued, and it was decided on April 7, 1913, just about 10 days after the White Slave case, the Hoke case, was decided; and that fact must be borne in mind in considering the meaning of this decision. I want to invite the particular attention of the Senate to just what was said in this decision. It was a very carefully considered opinion. It looks to me like it lays down a rule which seems to be pretty clearly established on this subject—troublesome and perplexing as it has been to the court itself. In that opinion Mr. Justice Day says:

That Congress has ample power in this connection—

That is, the regulation of interstate commerce—is no longer open to question.

I will say that this was a pure-food and drugs case. The articles were inherently unsound. I state that so that you may get the proposition clearly in your minds.

To return to the opinion:

That Congress has ample power in this connection is no longer open to question. That body has the right not only to pass laws which shall regulate legitimate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, but has full power to keep the channels of such commerce free from the transportation of illicit or harmful articles, to make such as are injurious to the public health outlaws of such commerce and to bar them from the facilities and privileges thereof.

In other words, the court in that decision clearly draws this line—that as to legitimate articles of commerce, articles of commerce inherently sound, articles of commerce that are not unlawful in character, articles of commerce that work no harm in their use when they are sent to the people of other States and enter into consumption in those States among the people who use them—there can only be regulation by Congress, and the power to prohibit can only be applied to illicit or unsound articles.

That is the doctrine. It is perfectly plain to me. I do not approve all the meanderings by which the court adopted it. I think the court has gone further than it ought to have gone, but I want to repeat it, because unless my mind is utterly in error about this entire question it seems to me to be the line that they have drawn, and drawn with unmistakable clearness. Quoting again from the opinion:

That body has the right not only to pass laws which shall regulate—

Not prohibit, but regulate—legitimate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, but has full power to keep the channels of such commerce free from the transportation of illicit—

Evidently they had the white-slave business in mind there—or harmful articles, to make such as are injurious to the public health outlaws of such commerce and to bar them from the facilities and privileges thereof.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, manifestly the Supreme Court in the White-Slave case went beyond that rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. This decision was rendered 10 days afterwards, and they cite the white-slave decision in this case. I think, under its reasoning, the white-slave decision is easily accounted for, as I have already pointed out.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly, but it was upon a different state of facts, and manifestly they went beyond that in the white-slave case. Let me call the Senator's attention to an illustration.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I am almost worn out, and I shall be glad to discuss this matter with him at some other time.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator is tired, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have occupied the floor much longer than I intended. I appreciate the Senator's interruptions, and his great courtesy, and his aid to me in this debate, and I appreciate the attention and aid of other Senators, but at present I think I shall suspend.

I desire to thank the Senate and Senators who have honored me with their presence and their attention to the remarks I have made in this matter. I have a profound, fixed conviction that this legislation is in violation of the Constitution of my country and of my oath of office. Therefore it will be impossible for me ever to support it, or to fail to do everything in my power in an honorable manner to defeat it.

During the delivery of Mr. HARDWICK's speech,

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is absent on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of the bill is desirous of making progress. No one else is ready to proceed, and therefore I shall undertake to say what I have to say in regard to the constitutionality of the measure before us. I shall be brief, if I am not detained by interruptions. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] some time ago discussed this matter at length and in all its phases, and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who has charge of the bill, has made a very elaborate presentation of it, these two Senators presenting the view that the bill is constitutional. We have also listened to an exceptionally able and earnest speech upon the part of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] advancing the other view. One might very well content himself ordinarily with casting his vote and relying upon the arguments already presented. But there is one feature of the question which, while it has been advanced in the way of argument, seems to me not to have been amplified as fully as the authorities justify; and it is the legal principle upon which, in my judgment, the bill must be sustained, if it is sustained at all. I shall not seek to advance either new or original arguments, but to amplify or enlarge to some extent upon principle so ably advanced by others.

The subject of interstate commerce is given over entirely to the National Government. Whatever from time to time it may be deemed wise and necessary to do in the treatment of this subject must be done by Congress. The power to regulate commerce among the several States is vested in Congress as completely and effectively, as fully and absolutely as it would or could be in a single State or sovereignty having a constitution with the other provisions of our National Constitution. As has so often been said, the power is plenary, complete within itself and may be exerted by the Congress, and by the Congress alone, to its utmost. Within the commerce clause itself we find no limitation, no circumscribing of the power. Whatever limitation there may be upon Congress must be found in some other provision or provisions of the Constitution, and perhaps I ought to say in the fundamental principles of regulated and constitutional government. For I take it that aside from the express provisions of the Constitution that the nature of society and of regulated government prescribes some limits which the legislative power may not transcend. In other words, there is no place in the fabric which the fathers constructed for the lodgment of purely arbitrary power. But aside from such limitations as may be found in other provisions of the Constitution and those fundamental principles of organized society which prohibit the exercise of purely arbitrary power, the power of Congress over interstate commerce is complete and without limitation.

This principle has been so often announced by the Supreme Court, and referred to already by able Senators, that I need not take the time which otherwise I should have taken to call attention at any length to the language of the Supreme Court in defining this unlimited power which Congress has over the interstate commerce. It is a subject matter which has been turned over completely to one sovereignty, and that sovereignty is the National Government. Whatever any sovereignty might do, having a constitution with similar provisions to our Constitution, with reference to this subject matter the National Congress may do with reference to this subject matter which has been turned over to it.

In the case of Hoke against United States, commonly known as the white-slave case (227 U. S., 308), it is said:

Congress is given power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The power is direct; there is no word of limitation in it, and its broad and universal scope has been so often declared as to make repetition unnecessary.

At the very beginning of the Government, in the case of Gibbons against Ogden (9 Wheaton, 1), the Supreme Court said:

This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, and may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

In the case of In re Rohan (140 U. S., 545), the court said:

The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject matter specifically admitted to its charge.

Disposing of it in all its fullness and completeness for the interest of the Government or the sovereignty which is to exercise the power.

Necessarily, Mr. President, there must come a time in the regulation of interstate commerce when the subject of the public welfare and morals and the health of the people may be involved. Necessarily there must come a time when the question shall arise whether a regulation relates alone to commerce or whether it has to do also with the morals and the health of the people. If that question should arise with reference to interstate commerce—if the question of the public welfare or the public interest or the health or the morals of the people should arise—what sovereignty and what power alone may deal with it? Manifestly the States can not deal with it, and manifestly, if the subject matter is ever to arise and to be dealt with, it must be dealt with by the only sovereign power which can deal with the subject matter.

The bill before us, in my judgment, has its origin not in a desire to serve commerce, technically and properly speaking, but in a desire to serve humanity, and therefore has to do with the morals and the citizenship of the country.

The question which is presented to us, therefore, in the consideration of this bill is whether or not the commerce clause is sufficiently broad to enable the Congress to take into consideration those questions of the health and morals of the people when they relate in any reasonable way to interstate trade. The question is, in other words, May Congress, with its power to regulate commerce, make laws which have the quality of police regulations? Can we in regulating commerce and under our power to regulate commerce so regulate it as to serve the health, the morals, and the welfare of the community?

Aside from the question of this power to regulate commerce, to augment or to keep the channels of interstate trade free from obstruction, aside from the power to build up and aid interstate commerce, has it in the regulation of commerce the additional power to enact such legislation as relates alone to police regulation or to the police powers?

If we should find, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States has no such power it is mere sophistry to undertake to sustain this bill upon the theory that it is in augmentation or in aid of commerce, technically and properly speaking. Unless the courts have gone so far as to say that with reference to this subject matter, to wit, interstate commerce, that we may exercise all power which has for its object and purpose the protecting of the channels of interstate trade from being used in a way which is deemed to be detrimental to the public interests or to the health or to the citizenship of the country, in my judgment we can not sustain it at all.

It is idle to say, Mr. President, that it is in aid of commerce per se to shut out an article because it has been manufactured by a child; it must have some broader purpose than to serve economic interests alone. It is idle to say that it is an aid or augmentation of commerce to shut out articles which have been manufactured in the same establishment as articles which have been manufactured by a child under a certain age. So we must meet the question squarely and deal with the issue as it is presented, and ascertain if we may whether or not the National Government possesses the police power with reference to the channels of interstate trade.

May I pause for a moment to inquire more particularly what is the police power? What is the nature of it? When we speak of the police power of the State or of any sovereign we mean nothing more than the power to legislate concerning persons and things. If a particular subject matter has been turned over to the National Government, then the police power of the National Government with reference to that subject matter is no more than the power to legislate concerning things and persons as they have connection with this particular subject. This subject matter, interstate commerce, having been turned over absolutely to the National Government, does not all the attributes of sovereignty go with the power?

In the case of Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 125):

The police powers are nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty * * * that is to say, the power to govern men and things.

In other words, it is the discretion of sovereignty with reference to any subject matter upon which that sovereignty may act in legislation or in matters of government, its regulation and control of a subject in whatever way becomes necessary for the public good. If a particular sphere is wholly within the sovereignty of the Federal Government, it must follow that it has the power to regulate for and in accord and in harmony with the public good.

The Supreme Court has further said in the case of Railway Co. v. Husen (95 U. S.):

By the general police powers of the State persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the community.

If this be the general police power, would not such police power necessarily attach wherever and whenever sovereignty was authorized to deal with a particular subject? Such sovereignty would not possess general police power, but with reference to the subject matter over which it was authorized to act. It would necessarily be permitted to do any and all things necessary to secure the general comfort, health, prosperity, morals, and safety of the people.

I do not claim, of course, that the National Government possesses a general police power. I claim that it possesses the police power relative to the particular subject matter which is turned over to it for legislation. Of course, the general police power belongs to the State, and the National Government possesses no police power except that which is drawn to it or which draws to itself by reason of the particular subject matter having been given over to it for legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It does not seem to me that the qualification the Speaker has made, which I suppose was an extract from the court's decision, would limit the power of Congress, if it has a national police power with relation to the subject matter, the power being directly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, because the Senator says he does not claim that the National Government has general police power but only police power in connection in this instance with the regulation of commerce among the States. If they have that national police power in connection with the regulation of commerce among the States, what is the limit to which Congress may go in regulating the affairs of the State and of the people within the State? Congress having the discretion itself to say what it does is for the benefit of the people of the several States, can it not prescribe anything in relation to the conditions and circumstances of manufacture in the States as a standard, and then prohibit the articles produced in those States from entering into interstate commerce unless they are manufactured in accordance with the standards set up by Congress, if the Senator's contention is correct?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has presented a question which would involve a definition of the police power; that is, the extent to which any sovereignty might go in the regulation, for instance, of intrastate commerce. The Senator might ask me to what extent may the State government go in prohibiting the channels of intrastate commerce from being used in certain ways. I would be unable to answer that. There has never been a definition of the police power. It is to some extent, as was said by Justice Holmes in a late decision, what the community predominantly comes to consider to be to the benefit of the community generally. The Supreme Court has never undertaken to define it with reference to the State, and of course I would be unable to say to what extent the Supreme Court might go in the regulation of commerce in the control of these matters which it deemed to be for the interest of the public welfare or public morals.

But this is my contention, the Senator will bear in mind. The National Government has been given the power to regulate commerce. That is a substantive grant. With it goes the implied power to so regulate as to serve the general community, its health, its morals or its public interest. The limit of that may be different under different circumstances, because there can be no possible doubt that is what is deemed to be a regulation under the police power or a reasonable exertion of police power to-day may be different from what it will be 25 years from now. The police power is after all the subjecting of all persons and things to what is deemed to be the interests of the entire community, and the interests of the community may be different in one decade from what they are in another.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I presume the Senator would agree that the prescribing of the hours during which children might work in the several States and the ages at which they might work would be an exercise of the police power.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If that is so, and of course it is so, and if Congress in the regulation of commerce under the Constitution among the States can exercise police power to that extent, I can not conceive of the police power which Congress could not exercise in the several States. If the exercise of the police power as defined by the Supreme Court and cited by the Senator is the power to legislate concerning men and things, I can not see why in regulating commerce on the pattern upon which this bill is fashioned Congress can not prescribe everything that is now left to State laws to prescribe and to put an inhibition on the products of any State from entering into interstate commerce unless they operate their State and the lives of their people to conform to standards in the discretion of Congress as set up by it.

Mr. BORAH. As I proceed with the authorities, I will undertake to differentiate with reference to the limits to which Congress may go.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, would there not be an analogy found by taking the opinion of Justice Holmes as the basis with reference to what is the State police power, being measured somewhat by the general sentiment of the community, and with reference to the application of the police power to the Federal Government to be the general sentiment and purpose of the people of the Nation? It strikes me that there is an analogy on which we may well found the supposition that this law would be recognized as valid.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is an illuminating suggestion, and I thank the Senator.

Let me in further response to the Senator at the present time call his attention to the fact that the Supreme Court has never undertaken to define the police power either with reference to the State or National Government. But I think the Senator from Connecticut will agree with the proposition that there must necessarily come a time in the regulation of commerce when something aside from the mere augmenting or aiding of commerce would be involved. That is to say, there are things so pronouncedly bad, so pronouncedly immoral, that the channels of interstate trade ought to be shut to them. That being true, who would exercise that power? Undoubtedly the State can not exercise it.

If we concede that, there must come a time when the channels of interstate trade are being used in a way so pronouncedly against the public interests or the public morals or the public health that it must be dealt with, the National Government must deal with it, and when it does, it is exercising the police power with reference to that subject matter. The State can not do it; some sovereignty must do it; no one but the National Government can do it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has asked me that question. Of course, I concede that already that has been done, and sustained by the Supreme Court in relation to articles in themselves noxious or dangerous to the public health or the public morals. The distinction that I think there is between the principle involved in the pending bill and all the other cases that have been decided along these lines is that this bill does not propose to deal with the article transported. It prohibits the transportation of the article absolutely unless made in accordance with rules set up by Congress in the State of its origin. I think there is a distinction between those cases and this one.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps we can deal with that subject better when we come to analyze those particular authorities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would have not made the statement, except that the Senator directed his remarks to me.

Mr. BORAH. I am not objecting to the interruption at all. Justice Holmes in a late case, Noble State Bank against Haskell, speaking for the entire court, said, in a general way, that the police power extends to all the great public needs:

It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare.

Now, certainly, it would be admitted that if that is a definition of the police power we must exercise such power as that with reference to the regulation of commerce, and, as I said a moment ago, if it is to be exercised at all in reference to interstate commerce it must be by the National Government and not by the State government.

Whatever power the State may see fit to exercise in the regulation of intrastate commerce is exercised by virtue of its police power; in other words, in regulating the commerce entirely within a State it does so in exercise of the police power of the State. Now, the National Government may exercise the same power and the same control and make the same regulations with reference to interstate commerce that the State government may over domestic or intrastate commerce. If we call one the police power, what is the other? Is it not the police power of respective sovereignties over their respective subjects? Is not, after all, this subject a simple one which consists of the exercise of the police power of the sovereignty over the particular subject matter which has been assigned to that sovereignty?

Having ascertained, Mr. President, what the police power is, does Congress possess that power with reference to interstate commerce? I wish to quote here a brief statement from Rufus Choate, made in the Senate March 14, 1842. It illustrates my contention that for a long number of years we have been exercising with reference to interstate commerce a power which is no other than the police power; that while it has not been so designated and is not now designated in so many terms as being the police power, in its essential nature it was and is the police power. Mr. Choate says:

The framers of the Constitution meant to clothe you with the power of disarming it (commerce) of all the evil and extracting from it all the good to which the wisdom of the Government is equal. They could not have intended to do anything so absurd as simply to authorize and require you to promote, enlarge, or advance commerce per se and in the abstract without regard to its quality; to its adverse or its propitious influence upon the prosperity, the morality, the health, and the industry of the people; to the goods it brought home; to the goods it carried away; the national character of the tonnage it employed and of the labor it rewarded. (Rufus Choate in the Senate, Mar. 14, 1842.)

The language of the distinguished Massachusetts lawyer is to the effect that it was not designed that Congress should be limited to the mere question of dealing with this subject matter as commerce per se technically and properly speaking, but it should operate in the whole realm of legislative regulation where the public interest is involved, the public health involved, or the public welfare involved.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] awhile ago referred to the eminent constitutional lawyer, Judge Cooley, and he is, of course, among the most distinguished of our constitutional authorities. Mr. Cooley said in his Constitutional Limitations:

It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is a custom to establish and to descend to the most minute directions if it shall be deemed advisable and that to whatever extent ground shall be covered by those directions the exercise of State power is excluded. Congress may establish police regulations as well as the States, confining their operations to the subjects over which it is given control by the Constitution.

It seems to me if that be sound—and I take it that his opinions are generally credited as sound upon such subjects—Congress may establish any regulation which it deems to be in the exercise of police regulation, so long as it touches the subject matter of interstate trade. If Congress comes to the conclusion that the channels of interstate trade are being used in such a way as to injure the public interests or the public morals or the public welfare, it may deal with that subject matter just the same as if the States should come to the conclusion that the intrastate channels of trade were being used to the detriment of the public interest or of public morals.

Mr. OVERMAN. Wheat being a subject of interstate commerce, does the Senator think that under the police power this Government would have the right to say that no person shall work more than eight hours in the wheat fields of Minnesota, for instance?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I caught the Senator's question. He referred to wheat and then spoke about labor, as I understood it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I referred to the regulation of the hours of labor in the wheat fields of Minnesota; and I asked, Could Congress prohibit wheat from going into interstate commerce if produced by labor in the wheat fields of Minnesota working more than eight hours a day?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would have to answer that by saying that, in my opinion, neither the State nor the National Government could undertake the exercise of that kind of power and call it a police power.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not?

Mr. BORAH. Because it would be deemed to be beyond what has been considered the public interest or the public welfare or the public health, and would not come within the limits of the police power.

Mr. OVERMAN. What would be the difference between that kind of a law and a law prohibiting the working for more than eight hours in a mill?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator, if I may, whether his argument does not necessarily involve the power of Congress to provide, if it desired to do so, that no wheat or other agricultural product shall enter into interstate commerce which is produced by child labor working more than eight hours a day?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Colorado put that question to me?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, my opinion is, Mr. President, that conditions might be such that that would be deemed to be within the police power of the National Government. Of course, I can not conceive of a condition of affairs arising in which it would be deemed to be to the public detriment that a child should not work in the wheat fields more than eight hours a day. Many questions might be asked upon the border line between what is a proper police regulation and what is not, and no man can tell unless the facts are presented to him in their entirety, whether it is contrary to public interests or to the public welfare or not.

In my opinion, if the child-labor question had been presented to Congress or to the Supreme Court 50 years ago, before factories became so universally established, and before the effect of child labor in those factories had been discerned, before it was believed to be contrary to the building up of the best citizenship of the country, we would likely have been unable to satisfy either Congress or the Supreme Court that this was a proper exercise of police power. Now, such conditions might arise and prevail that the working of children more than eight hours a day in a wheat field might be deemed destructive of their health and their development; if so, then if the products of their labor went directly to the channels of interstate commerce it could, under the principle for which I am contending, be inhibited to commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, so far as the sentiment is concerned, there is now a propaganda going on in this country proposing, as I understand, that an amendment be added to this bill that children shall not work in the fields for more than eight hours.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Well, I can understand that propaganda might be going on, but I do not believe that it is very well founded.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I know a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who has some letters from women asking that such an amendment be adopted to the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, for I do not intend to interrupt him at all—

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I introduced an amendment this morning along the lines suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the purpose of which was to call attention to certain evils of child labor in other departments of industry, with a view of endeavoring, if possible, to so provide in the law as to meet all the conditions which invoke this exercise of congressional power.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado please, of course the question presented to me by the Senator from North Carolina and the other questions are questions which require of me a definition of the police power of the Government, rather than a discussion of the question which I am now presenting, as to whether or not the National Government possesses the police power with reference to interstate commerce. I have never known a court to undertake to define what the police power is within limitations or laying down rules by which it could be determined definitely, and I certainly would not, in the presentation of this question, deem that it devolved upon me or upon any of the supporters of this bill, to define in all its applications the police power. What I say is, that whatever the police power is, and the extent to which it may go, the National Government does possess it with reference to the channels of interstate trade.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me right there, I wish to say that it seems to me, even conceding the statement of the Senator, to wit, that in the regulation of commerce among the States, Congress must possess some power, at least, in the nature of police power; the Senator is in danger of confusing that with the regulation of production. Granted that the Congress may have authority to exercise all regulations about the subject that it is authorized to legislate upon, to wit, commerce among the States, is that the same thing as setting up a standard of production in the State of origin, and then prohibiting interstate commerce in articles in the State of origin that do not come up to a standard of production fixed by Congress?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I am going to undertake to analyze some of the authorities in a few moments, to see the extent to which we may go, but in the meantime let me say that long years ago when that question was raised—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In the Knight sugar case.

Mr. BORAH. And prior to that time—during Marshall's time—in which the subject of the exercise of this power and the abuse of it was discussed, Chief Justice Marshall said that the only remedy for that, and the only safety that the people had against the abuse of such power, it being in existence, was the change of their public representatives. In other words, the liability to abuse is no argument against the existence of the power.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not ask the Senator to answer me at once, but I do ask him during his argument, to which I am listening with interest, to say if it is not a reasonable claim that the police power must be incident to the interstate commerce itself and connected with transportation from State to State, or police responsibility rather than a responsibility entirely independent of transportation?

Mr. BORAH. I think that is true. Prof. Freund, in his treatise on the police power, says:

It is impossible to deny that the Federal Government exercises a considerable police power of its own. This police power rests chiefly upon the constitutional power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, but not exclusively so. * * * It must now also be regarded as firmly established that the power over commerce, while primarily intended to be exercised in behalf of economic interests, may be used for the protection of safety, order, and morals.

Would there be any question of the power of Congress to prevent the running of freight trains on Sunday in the interest of the health and morals of the people? If so, would not this clearly be an exercise of the police power?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. The police power has been held to be an attribute of sovereignty possessed by every sovereign State and a necessary attribute of every civilized government. In my judgment, the police power necessarily inheres in any government concerning that subject matter over which that Government exercises complete sovereignty. In other words, the police power is but another name for that authority which resides in every sovereignty to pass all laws for the proper regulation and control of any subject matter committed to that sovereignty in the interest of the health, the morals, and the public welfare of the community.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the quotation the Senator has read touches a phase of this question about which I should like to be informed. It refers to the power of the Government to regulate the running of freight trains, for example, as a part of its police power. Does the Senator think it would have that power where the freight train was operated over a railroad running exclusively within a State?

Mr. BORAH. No; certainly not.

Mr. WORKS. Then it must be connected with interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly, but if Congress should inhibit the running of interstate freight trains through a State on Sunday it would be in the interest of the public morals of the State, rather than in the interest of commerce.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly, that would undoubtedly be true; but it must connect itself in some way with the power of the Government to deal with matters which affect more than one State.

Mr. BORAH. I do not contend otherwise.

Mr. WORKS. I did not catch the name of the author from whom the quotation was taken.

Mr. BORAH. The particular quotation with reference to freight trains was from the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WORKS. Very well. Then, I was questioning the correctness of the statement of the case by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. There are plenty of authorities to the effect that Congress may do that thing.

Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt of their power to do that as connected with interstate commerce. I think the Senator is right about that unquestionably.

Mr. BORAH. I have not contended for a moment that Congress could pass an act providing that an intrastate road should not run its freight trains on Sunday.

Mr. WORKS. I asked that question in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] a moment ago, whether it was not necessary to connect the exercise of such authority in some way with the power to deal with interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. In the case of Bank v. Haskell (219 U. S., 111) the court says:

It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs. It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare.

Again, the Supreme Court says in the case of Mutual Loan Co. against Martel, in Two hundred and twenty-second United States, page 232:

The police power is not confined to the suppression of what is offensive, disorderly, or insanitary, but extends to so dealing with the conditions which exist in the State as to bring out of them the greatest welfare of its people.

In a sense the police power is but another name for the power of government and a contention that a particular exercise of it offends the due-process clause of the Constitution is apt to be very intangible to a precise consideration and answer.

Mr. President, I want to examine some of the authorities, and the first one that I shall ask the Senate to consider with me is what is known as the Lottery case. There was a time when the Lottery case was looked upon as being questionable law in the Supreme Court of the United States, the opinion having been rendered by a bare majority of the court, as I remember—at least there were strong dissenting opinions—but in view of the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States I think that there can be no doubt any longer that the majority opinion of the court in the Lottery case has come to be the settled law of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Lottery case can not be sustained upon any other principle or theory than that of the power of Congress to protect the channels of interstate trade from use by people for immoral purposes or for purposes which are deemed to be detrimental to the public interests. No one can contend successfully, for instance, that the mere transportation of a lottery ticket through the channels of interstate trade, considering the ticket itself and its inability of itself to work any detriment to the community in its course of transportation and the manner of its carrying, would be a subject matter which the Congress would take consideration of if it were not permitted to consider also the other proposition of the effect upon the morals of the community in the use of the lottery ticket. The statute, as Senators will remember, was a criminal statute, and I want to read it. It says:

That any person who shall cause to be brought within the United States from abroad for the purpose of disposing of the same, or deposited in, or carried by the mails of the United States, or carried from one State to another in the United States, any paper, certificate, or instrument purporting to be or represent a ticket, chance, share, or interest in or depending upon the event of a lottery, so-called gift, concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon the law of chance, or shall cause any advertisement of such lottery so-called gift concert or similar enterprises, offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, to be brought into the United States, or deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or transferred from one State to another in the same, shall be punishable in the first offense by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both, and in the second and after offenses by such imprisonment only.

Almost every question which has been raised with reference to the child-labor bill was raised by the distinguished lawyers who argued the lottery case. It was believed to be the entering of the National Government into intrastate concerns for the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State. It was contended that it was not enacted in the interest of commerce, that it was simply to enforce certain laws which had to do with the moral conduct of the individuals in the particular States where they were located. It was urged that it was a subterfuge, while professing to regulate commerce, was in fact intended alone to punish individual conduct.

Justice Harlan, who wrote the opinion of the court, said:

If a State, when considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits, may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money in that mode, why may not Congress invest it with power to regulate commerce among the several States, providing that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another? In this connection it must not be forgotten that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States is plenary, is complete in itself, is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution. What provision in that instrument may be regarded as limiting the exercise of the power granted? What clause can be cited which in any degree countenances the suggestion that one may of right carry, or cause to be carried, from one State to another that which will harm the public morals? We can not think of any clause of that instrument that could possibly be invoked by those who assert their right to send lottery tickets from State to State except the one providing that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law.

The public morals, Mr. President—not the morals of the State of Idaho, not the morals of the State of North Carolina, but the morals of this one unity, the Nation and the people who are subject to it. Can a State be more interested in the protection of the moral and physical well-being of the citizen than is the United States?

The misery, sir, which has haunted the dark lanes of London in these many years; the dismal, soulless beings who for generations have crowded Trafalgar Square, came near being England's undoing in her hour of greatest need. The Boer war admonished her that some sinister influence was at work with the finer virtues of her manly people—that something of the moral fiber, the physical prowess, and even love of country, had been forfeited in the fearful grind for wealth. And when the present crisis came on, the warning which she had received a few years ago came to be a troubled realization. If the time ever comes when we are called upon, as some nations are now being called upon, to test the endurance and capacity of our people even unto the utmost, to search the hearts and souls of our people for those qualities of citizenship which in the last analysis are the real reserves of the country, we may be called upon to reflect upon our past conduct relative to our effort to maintain and preserve the citizenship, the stature, the physical and moral well-being of our entire people. For upon their shoulders alone rests the Republic in the hour of peril.

Now, in this larger and broader and more tremendous question of the upbuilding and preservation of our citizenship the keeping it up to the highest standard of moral and physical efficiency may we not so regulate and control the instrumentalities of government as to discourage and punish those who are engaged in practices wholly inimical to the building up and preservation of our citizens? If we find those in our community employing the young of our country under such conditions as ultimately to affect the whole country, to lower the standard physically and morally of our people, may we not in the exercise of the power granted to Congress to regulate commerce so regulate it as to withdraw from them the means of interstate commerce while they are so engaged in such practices? In other words, may we not in regulating commerce so regulate it as to serve this great cause of upbuilding and preserving the moral and physical well-being of our entire citizenship? Are those who are engaged in the practices which are condemned by the common judgment of men to be contrary to the best interests of the people as a whole entitled to use the facilities of interstate commerce in carrying on their business? If we must say that notwithstanding the immoral methods of production, your products are nevertheless entitled to enjoy the same privileges as products produced in accord with the best interests of the country, if in other words, the inanimate object of commerce itself being clean and in no sense dangerous it must go through the channels of trade notwithstanding it was produced in ways wholly at war with the best interests of society and of the Government, then of course the supporters of this bill are wrong in their contention. But if, on the other hand, we may take into consideration in the regulation of commerce the interests of communities as a whole, the welfare of the people as an entirety, the general interests of the Nation, and so regulate it as to conserve and encourage and augment those interests, then the supporters of this bill are upon safe ground.

The public morals, the public interest, and citizenship, as indicated by Justice Harlan in this opinion, are within the purview of the National Government quite as fully and completely as within the purview of the State government. And when these matters are reasonably related to interstate commerce, when they may be conserved by the regulation of interstate commerce, Congress may act.

If the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another be interstate commerce, and if Congress is of opinion that an effective regulation for the suppression of lotteries, carried on through such commerce, is to make it a criminal offense to cause lottery tickets to be carried from one State to another, we know of no authority in the courts to hold that the means thus devised are not appropriate and necessary to protect the country at large against a species of interstate commerce which, although in general use and somewhat favored in both National and State legislation in the early history of the country, has grown into disrepute and has become offensive to the entire people of the Nation.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] awhile ago put a question as to the extent to which we could finally go in this matter. The same question was presented by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. As Justice Harlan says, lotteries have come at last, in the judgment of the people of the United States, to be inimical to the public interest; and we having arrived at that conclusion, the mere fact that we did not entertain such an opinion 50 years ago is no reason why we should not exercise the powers of Congress in accordance with the public opinion which we entertain at this time.

Now, Mr. President, let us look for a moment at the white-slave decision.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, I have no doubt myself of the correctness of the decision in the lottery-ticket cases. I have just as little doubt of the proposition advanced by the Senator from Idaho that the Government of the United States has the right to protect the morals and the health of the country as a country, or as a whole; but that, it seems to me, does not quite meet the situation.

It is not claimed that the thing to be carried in this case is detrimental to health or morals at all. The bill goes back into the State, and prohibits the carrying of these goods because they are manufactured in a particular way within the State. It seems to me to present an entirely different proposition. That is the phase of the case that I should be glad to have the Senator from Idaho cover in what he is going to say—and I have no doubt he will—because that is the troublesome feature of it to me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, inasmuch as the Senator has alluded to the question I asked him, the same thought occurred to me that has occurred to the Senator from California. In fact, it was discussed at length before the committee in the hearings. It seemed to me that the distinction between the lottery case and the principle which is the basis of this bill was that the lottery decision prohibited the transportation of an integral part of the lottery system itself. This bill seeks to prohibit nothing of that kind. It does not prohibit the transportation of child labor or of children, but of an innocent product of child labor.

Mr. BORAH. But the question is, Why did the National Government prohibit the transportation of that particular ticket? Was it because of any defect in the ticket itself, because it in itself was dangerous to commerce, or because during its transportation it might in any way diminish or disorganize or demoralize commerce? It was because of the intent with which it was sent through the channels of interstate trade, and it was prohibited for the reason, and no other reason, than because Congress said that the channels of interstate trade shall not be used for a purpose—whatever that purpose or however used—which may be considered detrimental to the public welfare. Now, if you may not use the channels of trade to carry articles which end in immorality and evil, can you use the channels of trade to carry articles produced by immoral and wrongful methods?

Mr. WORKS. But it was intended to prevent the carrying of an unlawful or immoral influence into another State.

Mr. BORAH. If you can prevent the carrying of an article into a State because it may have an immoral influence when it gets there, may you not exercise the same power to prevent a man from carrying an article out of a State when he has produced it in a way which is deemed to be immoral where it is being produced?

Mr. WORKS. That is, to my mind, the crux of the whole question.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I can not see how it can be very well said that Congress was given a power which it may exercise for the benefit of those at one end of the channel, and which it may not exercise for the benefit of those who are at the other end of the channel. The Congress closes its channels to an article because it may effectuate wrong; may it not deny its channels to trade which, because it can be shipped, helps to make wrongdoing profitable?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, it is on this theory: That so far as the consumption end of it is concerned, the several States of the Union can have no protection unless Congress gives it; and they, against their will, and without power to prevent it, will be put at a disadvantage and compelled to do something or to receive something that they do not want to receive. But in the case of production, going to the other end, the conditions of labor referred to on this very subject can only be such as the State permits, and they do not affect anybody except the people in that State.

Mr. BORAH. Let us examine this other case that we have before us and see if it throws any light upon the subject. That in the case of Hoke v. The United States (227 U. S., 308), known as the white-slave case. The Supreme Court says in this case, in the syllabi:

While women are not articles of merchandise, the power of Congress to regulate their transportation in interstate commerce is the same, and it may prohibit such transportation if for immoral purposes.

The right to be transported in interstate commerce is not a right to employ interstate transportation as a facility to do wrong, and Congress may prohibit such transportation to the extent of the white-slave traffic act of 1910.

If you can not use the channels of interstate trade for the purpose of effectuating a wrong, can you use the channels of interstate trade to carry a product which has been produced or effectuated by a wrong?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the distinction lies in the fact that in the white-slave cases they were trying to prohibit the carrying of an immoral influence into another State.

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily, Mr. President. If A should have invited a woman from Louisiana or New Orleans to go to Beaumont, Tex., although the woman may have known nothing of the purpose, and although she might have been as pure as the driven snow when she arrived there, if he afterwards induced her to enter into a state of concubinage he had violated the law.

A transaction had occurred which was wholly within a State, wholly within the control of the State government, wholly within the criminal law; but the man had used the channels of interstate trade in carrying a perfectly innocent person and a perfectly moral person to that place for the purpose of accomplishing his purpose.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but I will suggest to the Senator that he must take into account the man as well as the woman. The woman may have been perfectly innocent in the case suggested by the Senator. It is the man that is inducing the transportation of the woman from one State into another.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but the man had not been in the channels of interstate trade. He had not been in the course of transportation at all. He had not passed over the road. The only one who had been in the channels of trade and had passed over the channels of trade in the train or was in commerce was the perfectly innocent party.

Mr. CLAPP. Even if the man went along, his going was not commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, suppose there should be offspring as the result of these immoralities; would Congress have power, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the States, to prohibit their transportation from one State to another?

I ask the question in all seriousness, Mr. President, because I think it is a distinction which might be applied here; and if the Senator's argument, to which I am listening with profound interest, is correct, then it would seem to me that Congress could so legislate.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think so. I do not think that would be sufficiently incidental to the interstate-commerce act, or transportation, perhaps, to come within the control of Congress.

Again, the Supreme Court in the syllabi says:

Congress may adopt not only the necessary but the convenient means necessary to exercise its power over a subject completely within its power, and such means may have the quality of police regulations.

Well, when it has the quality of police regulations it is police regulation. It is no different than if the court, instead of saying "have the quality of police regulations," had said, "has the power of police regulation."

Then the only question is, Mr. President, To what extent may Congress exercise that police power? I concede that it must be the exercise of such police power as is incidental in a reasonable way to commerce, or to interstate commerce. If it is wholly disconnected from interstate commerce, and can not be said to be reasonably allied with it or in any way connected with it, certainly the mere fact that Congress possesses the police power would not enable it to deal with it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him there to explain how the regulation of the hours of labor in a mill in a State is related to interstate commerce?

Mr. BORAH. In just a few minutes, when I get through with this decision, I will do that, or try to do it, at least.

The court says:

What the act condemns is transportation obtained or aided or transportation induced in interstate commerce for the immoral purposes mentioned. It urges a right exercised in morality to sustain a right to be exercised in immorality. It is the same right which attacked the law of Congress which prohibits the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State to another. It is the same right which was excluded as an element affecting the constitutionality of the act for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce. It is the right given for beneficial exercise which is attempted to be perverted to and justly baneful exercise, as in the instances stated and which finds further illustration in Reid v. Colorado (187 U. S. 137). This constitutes the supreme fallacy of plaintiffs' error. It pervades and vitiates their contentions.

Plaintiffs in error admit that the States may control the immoralities of its citizens. Indeed, this is their chief insistence, and they especially condemn the act under review as a subterfuge and an attempt to interfere with the police power of the States to regulate the morals of their citizens, and assert that it is in consequence an invasion of the reserved powers of the States. There is unquestionably a control in the States over the morals of their citizens, and, it may be admitted, it extends to making prostitution a crime. It is a control, however, which can be exercised only within the jurisdiction of the States, but there is a domain which the States can not reach and over which Congress alone has power.

Our dual form of government has its perplexities, State and Nation having different spheres of jurisdiction, as we have said, but it must be kept in mind that we are one people; and the powers reserved to the States and those conferred on the Nation are adapted to be exercised, whether independently or concurrently, to promote the general welfare, material and moral. This is the effect of the decisions, and surely if the facility of interstate transportation can be taken away from the demoralization of lotteries, the debasement of obscene literature, the contagion of diseased cattle or persons, the impurity of food and drugs, the like facility can be taken away from the systematic enticement to and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women and, more insistently, of girls.

This is the aim of the law expressed in broad generalization; and motives are made of determining consequence. Motives executed by actions may make it the concern of Government to exert its powers. Right purpose and fair trading need no restrictive regulation, but let them be transgressed and penalties and prohibitions must be applied.

The principle established by the cases is the simple one, when rid of confusing and distracting considerations, that Congress has power over transportation "among the several States"; that the power is complete in itself, and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, suppose we separate these two things—the production and the transportation. I presume that the Senator would not claim that the National Government had any right to interpose in the mere matter of production within a State, independently of the question of transportation?

Mr. BORAH. No; certainly it would not. The Congress has nothing to do with production per se, but in the regulation of commerce it may affect production.

Mr. WORKS. Going a step further, the act of transportation is of a product that is perfectly innocent in itself; and how you can connect the two things together, and make the transportation illegal or against good morals or good health, is the question in my mind.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Well, I think the Senator will concede this much—that so long as the channels of interstate trade may be used by those who are employing child labor it augments and encourages child labor. Interstate commerce is a part of the successful carrying out of their scheme to use beneficially their child labor.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but the child-labor question is one that is confined wholly to the State.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but what I want the Senator to admit is this—that so long as the Government lends its instrumentalities of government to the use of those who employ child labor, it is augmenting and encouraging the doing of that which is deemed to be immoral or contrary to the public interest. Now, may not the Government withdraw its instrumentalities of government and say that they are not subject to the use of those who are employing child labor, because of the fact that by doing so we are aiding, augmenting, encouraging, and sustaining the employment of child labor? The employing of child labor, the carrying the goods in interstate commerce, are parts of a plan as a whole.

Mr. WORKS. The trouble about it is, I think, that the Senator is attempting to combine two things—one illegal or objectionable on moral grounds, and the other perfectly and wholly innocent; and with the one that is not innocent the State has the full and exclusive right to deal, and the Government has none. Now, the mere act of transporting these goods after they are manufactured in a way that we think is objectionable is in no sense a violation of the rights of the Government. It does not in any way affect the public morals or the public health, it seems to me. I am glad to admit anything that will solve this question in a legitimate way.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator this question: Does he contend that the Congress of the United States must stand idly by and not exert its power over the interstate channels of trade when those channels are being used by people who, by reason of the use, are encouraged in the doing of things which the Senator believes to be wrong?

Mr. WORKS. That, in my judgment, is not the question. It is not a question whether the Government should stand by or not; but the thing that is being done with which the Government has a right to interfere is not in any sense illegal, and I think it can not be made illegal by a mere dictum of the Congress of the United States, because it is innocent in itself.

Mr. WORKS. That, in my judgment, is not the question. It is not a question of whether the thing being done with which the Government has a right to interfere or not is in any sense illegal, but I think it can not be made illegal by the mere dictum of the Congress of the United States if innocent in itself.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, does not the Senator concede too much if he meant to concede that the child-labor evil is solely a State evil, or an evil within a State? The lottery can be carried on within a State, and Congress can not affect that. Now, you come to carry out the purposes of the lottery by transporting the tickets in interstate commerce. In the case of the child-labor proposition, if you stop within the State that is the end of it, but you have to carry it out by carrying the products of child labor in interstate commerce just as you carried the tickets of the lottery.

As to the lottery-ticket situation, I do not think Congress prohibited that because of the effect it might have upon two or three people, or even a thousand people, who might engage in the lottery business, or in the white-slave matter because of the immorality that might be committed in some cases at the end of the line, but it was because of the general scheme and system of immorality which was involved in that act within the State and the transportation and the act at the end of the line. In the lottery it was the general scheme and plan that was offensive to our high standard of morality and our high standard of the public welfare. That is exactly true with child labor. It is the general scheme of making articles by child labor and selling those articles in other States; it is a general plan and a general method of production that is offensive to the public welfare and public morals of our citizenship.

Mr. WORKS. It may be that the Senator from Idaho conceded too much, as is suggested by the Senator from Iowa. I think myself he has conceded away his whole case.

Mr. BORAH. I will ask the Senator what I have conceded. I have no concession such as the Senator from Iowa suggested.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator conceded, as I understood him, that the Government has no right to interfere with the production by child labor.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator did not put that question. The Senator put the single question whether or not we could interfere with the simple fact of production. Of course if it is exclusively intrastate, and the production is separated from the fact that the article is to be shipped into interstate trade, that is one question; but I am not conceding for a moment that the Government is not interested in that production when the production goes on through the efforts of child labor, and is all a part of an entire plan involving the use of the channels of interstate trade.

Mr. WORKS. It seems to me that the whole ground upon which this sort of legislation may be maintained is the very one suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that because it affects the morals of the people of the State it affects the whole mass of the people of this country; upon that ground the Government may interfere. I think that is the only ground, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, or the only thing that has been suggested to my mind that would uphold this kind of legislation. I do not think it is possible to connect it with transportation and sustain it in that way.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that the Senator has been here all the time. I referred to the fact that the National Government was just as much interested in the morals of its people and its citizenship as the State was, and that it was for the reason that the National Government has a duty to perform toward its citizenship as a whole in protecting the moral and physical well-being of the citizenship as a whole that it could take hold of this subject. I have not made any concession to the contrary to that, because it is the basis of my contention here. What I did say, of course, was that the production of this and the act of manufacturing wholly within the State is a matter for the State, but I have made no further concession.

Mr. WORKS. That is a very plausible way of presenting the question and it has its force, but that position would certainly give the right to the National Government to interfere and legislate with respect to anything immoral within a State if you separate it from the question of transportation. You have to connect the two together in order to give Congress jurisdiction to deal with it at all. That takes me back again to the matter I suggested awhile ago, whether you can connect the innocent act with the act on which the Government is attempting to legislate and in that way attach jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say, if the manufacturers of this country from one end to the other are manufacturing goods in such a way as to be detrimental to the welfare of the citizens, as to be undermining the moral and physical condition of the citizenship, may not the Congress of the United States withdraw the instrumentalities of Congress from the use of those who undertake to use it for the purpose of shipping those goods which have been thus manufactured in this way? If they keep the goods wholly within the State the Senator is correct, but when they undertake to use the channels of interstate trade to augment and build up and sustain and keep alive their business, then may not the Government withdraw the use of those channels and those who thus employ labor?

Mr. WORKS. I think if there was a combination in different States for that purpose, transportation facilities being used to carry out that purpose existing in different States, undoubtedly that might be so. I want the Senator from Idaho to understand that I am trying to get information on this subject. I have not thoroughly made up my mind as to what course I shall pursue when it comes to the question of voting on this bill, but there is a difficulty in the way of it, and I know the Senator from Idaho is as competent to deal with those questions as any man I know of, and I am asking questions and calling his attention to the difficulties that present themselves to my mind.

Mr. BORAH. Now, let me put this question to the Senator. I am very glad to have this discussion with the Senator because I realize his ability and integrity of purpose. Suppose there is a manufacturing establishment in California that is sustaining itself and living by reason of the fact, first, that it employs children of a very tender age and at very low prices; second, that it must have a market in New York City.

Mr. WORKS. Will the Senator be kind enough to take some other State for illustration, because that could not be done in California. We have a very strict child-labor law in California, I am glad to say.

Mr. BORAH. Let us assume before that law was enacted, just for the purpose of illustration, the manufacturing establishments there which by reason of competing conditions employed children of tender years, and very long hours, but suppose its only market for goods was in New York City, would the Senator believe that Congress was inhibited from denying the use of the channels of interstate trade to those goods which were thus created by it and upon which it was dependent entirely for its maintenance?

Mr. WORKS. If I were able to answer that I would be perfectly prepared to vote on this bill. Those are things I want to know.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Idaho a question? I want to understand his position. Did I understand the Senator to say that Congress has the right to withdraw from a State the right to ship goods in interstate commerce?

Mr. BORAH. No; what I said was this: Suppose there is a manufacturing establishment in North Carolina employing child labor at a very low figure and very tender years, and it was dependent for its existence upon two or three facts; first, the employment of child labor; second, the ability to use the channels of interstate trade to carry its goods to its only market in New York City, could Congress in order to prevent the employment of child labor for the protection of its citizens in which the Government is just as much interested as South Carolina or North Carolina say that the instrumentalities of the Government shall not be used to carry the goods thus manufactured in contravention to the good morals and the welfare of the people of the country?

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator's position, but I thought he did say that Congress would have a right to withdraw from a State the right to ship in interstate commerce. There is no such power as that granted in the Constitution. The only power granted is the power to regulate.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I know the word "regulate" was used by the Constitution makers for the purpose of giving over to the National Government the entire control of interstate commerce. There are some things which you can deny the State the right to ship into other States.

Mr. OVERMAN. You can make a regulation of interstate commerce, but you can not deny the right of a State to ship.

Mr. BORAH. It may take the form of prohibition. Congress can prohibit you from shipping certain things from North Carolina to South Carolina.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator, of course everybody does, that the entire Nation is just as much interested in the morals and the health of the citizens of every State as the States are themselves, but the question in my mind is in what channels the National Government has authority to exercise power. It seems to me that there must be some things that pertain to the health and the morals of the people of the State that are exempt from the action of Congress. The Senator says that we may withdraw, by way of the regulation of commerce among the States, the instrumentalities of commerce from the use of those who do not conform to our standard involving health and morals, and so forth. The Senator would not claim that Congress could pass an act prohibiting interstate transportation of the goods of a factory in New York that was not properly equipped with fire escapes and fire apparatus and sanitary appliances for the convenience and health of its operators.

Mr. BORAH. There are conditions in which, I believe, Congress could do that. If the relationship to commerce was sufficiently connected.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in connection with the question the Senator from Idaho put to me awhile ago may I make a further suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WORKS. When it comes back to what I suggested before, taking the case that the Senator submits, where, in California, the goods are manufactured in a way that may be regarded as detrimental to morals or health, and the shipping of those goods to New York, the transportation is not detrimental to anybody. Assuming that the goods are themselves of an interstate character, the act of transportation does not affect anybody.

Mr. BORAH. Yes it does.

Mr. WORKS. Just wait a moment. The selling of the goods does not affect anybody in New York, but we have got to connect that up with the production within the State. The whole difficulty, in my mind, is as to whether you can connect those two things. The Senator, of course, insists that by allowing transportation you are aiding in the production of goods in an improper way. The question in my mind is whether that would give Congress the power to deal with the question as an interstate matter. To me it is a very serious question.

Mr. BORAH. I can imagine that it is, and it is a serious question to everyone, because I think we are on the border line of the power of Congress with reference to these matters.

But first I will answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut whether or not we could now deny a manufacturing establishment the right to ship goods because it did not have a proper fire escape. I would not undertake to say offhand that that is such a matter as would be considered to affect the general interests or the general welfare or the public concern of the people as a whole throughout the United States. But I can imagine a relationship of these things to commerce which would justify the interference of Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not interrupt the Senator again, but I will take this opportunity to say, if the Senator will allow me, modern interstate commerce is so intricate and the production of the States and the consumption of the States, the trading of all the States is so inextricably involved in interstate commerce that if Congress has the power over interstate commerce to prohibit and put an embargo on the States from importing and exporting with each other until they shall comply, in the interest of public morals and health, with such standards as Congress may set up, it is good-by to any government in this country except that of an "imperium" located here in Washington, and Congress will henceforth have the powers of the British Parliament.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated a fact which is necessary for this legislation. As time has gone on, those things being interlaced and intermingled, necessarily the National Government has had to take over and assume control in such a way that it never deemed necessary before. But will the Senator contend, for instance, that the State government can exercise police regulations over interstate commerce?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. BORAH. Not at all. Yet the Senator says that commerce has become so intermingled and so interlaced and is so subject to national control that it can deal with no part of it practically without dealing with it all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I say commerce is so inextricably intermingled between the States that if Congress can prohibit the instrumentalities of railroad transportation to the products of a State unless they conform in all respects in their production to any standard that Congress may set up for it, then it has abolished the necessity for any State government at all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho has not contended for any particular standard. I have said repeatedly that there is a limit to the exercise of the police power both in the State and the National Government. Of course Congress in the exercise of police power over the channels of interstate trade must be within those limits which may be defined from time to time to be within the limits of the police power, just the same as the State must be within its limits. The Senator from Connecticut makes the same argument which has been made against the exercise of the police power in a thousand instances over matters purely intrastate.

But the Senator from Connecticut is making the same argument which has been made against the exercise of the police power in many instances over matters purely intrastate, time and again on the street corners. It has been argued that with reference to intrastate powers, the exercise of the police power under the circumstances was to rob the citizen of individuality, of initiative, and to place him completely under the socialism of the State. The Supreme Court has answered by saying, as it said in the bank case from Oklahoma, that whatever the common and public opinion comes to regard as the public welfare, shall be regarded by this court as the police power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have not made any such argument against the constitutionality of the legislation in the cases which the court has sustained. I am simply saying now that, in my opinion, we are at the parting of the ways; and I say that in the cases where the court has sustained the constitutionality of the previous acts to which the Senator has referred, they were cases where the commodity itself prohibited from interstate transportation was noxious or deleterious; and that this case does not purport to prohibit the commodity because it is deleterious, but because it was manufactured under conditions which do not suit the temporary view of this Congress.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Connecticut is mistaken about that. The courts have not always confined it to instances where the article in transportation was deleterious or injurious to interstate commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Or for an immoral purpose, of course.

Mr. BORAH. Then, when you say for an immoral purpose you must leave it to the discretion of Congress as to what is an immoral purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But I say—

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not the point. The article itself was prohibited from transportation because it was to be used for an immoral purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; because it was conducive to an immoral purpose, and when you prohibit the shipment through interstate commerce of goods which have been created through immoral agencies you are acting precisely upon the same principle as when you prohibit the shipment of goods which are to be used for immoral purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To my mind, that carries it a step further than the courts have ever gone. The Senator says that the only way to prevent a perpetuation of this abuse and of what is considered to be a wrong is to prohibit the man back in the State from employing child labor, but the transportation of the article produced by child labor into the other States does not at all contribute to any immoral purpose. This measure is simply designed to prohibit the employment of children back home in the several States; and the Senator says that the transportation of the article may contribute to that end. That, I think, is going further than the courts have ever gone in this class of cases.

Mr. BORAH. It may be, applying the principle on a different state of facts from what the courts have ever applied it; but there can not be any other interpretation of the white-slave act than, as the Supreme Court held, that the channels of interstate trade should not be used in any way at all which would finally result in that which was detrimental to the morals of the people of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not that act before me, but let me call the Senator's attention right here to the fact that in the white-slave act transportation must have been done with the purpose of committing immorality.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. The purpose, the intent, goes back equally to the criminality in view of the statute or whether it was criminal and the criminal intent. As I said a moment ago, the person transported in interstate commerce might have been wholly innocent of any improper intent whatever; the person transported might have been wholly innocent of any improper thought or purpose, but the party who had the criminal intent was always solely and completely within the control of the State government; the party who invited the other individual into the State was always completely within the police power of the State government, was solely subject to its jurisdiction, while the party who traveled in interstate commerce may have been perfectly innocent of any improper intent or purpose, yet the Supreme Court said that these channels of trade are closed even to perfectly innocent people in purpose and thought. Why? To promote the morals of the community, and for nothing else in the world.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understood it, the channels of interstate commerce were not closed to the innocent party, but they were penalized after they arrived.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The guilty party was penalized—the man who meant the evil.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; the guilty party.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the purpose of which was to close the channel of interstate commerce. It made it immoral to use it. That is the distinction; that is the difference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is the same in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Let me see whether it is or not.

Mr. WORKS rose.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I should like to get through with one at a time. Let me see whether it is or not. Here is John Jones, in the State of South Carolina, or, I will say, in the State of Idaho, in order that I may offend no one. He is manufacturing goods. So far as his purpose is concerned, he has no intention except to get his goods into interstate commerce, but he is employing child labor. He must use the channels of interstate trade. The goods which he ships in interstate trade are not deleterious; they are not bad; they are in no way an injury to commerce, any more than the particular individual who is invited to go into another State was deleterious to interstate commerce or in any way bad; but the court says that this channel shall be closed to you—

You are prohibited from using it, for the reason that we conceive it to be to the injury of the people of the United States, of the entire community, to have the kind of business going on in which you are engaged; as you are engaged in a business which is immoral, which is undermining the public welfare, which is contrary to the health and to the interests of its citizens, we will withdraw the instrumentalities of interstate commerce from your use.

What is the difference between that proposition and withdrawing those channels from the use of a man who was inviting a perfectly innocent person into another State? In both instances the commodity of itself is not injurious to commerce; in both instances they are innocent; in both instances they are commerce; and in both instances the parties who are finally punished are completely within the control of the State and completely within the police power of the State. Now, what is the difference between the two propositions?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] showed the difference.

Mr. BORAH. I did not hear what the Senator from Georgia said.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He said that the State of origin could prevent the article going out to protect itself, if it wanted to do so. There was no harm done at the other end of the innocent article going—

Mr. BORAH. That is where we differ. This power of Congress does not depend on the power of the State to protect itself; it depends upon the terms of the grant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not from the article.

Mr. BORAH. No; not from the article. Neither was there any harm from the persons referred to going into the other State. The harm arose after they had gone into the other State and became completely subject to the police power of that State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Exactly; but no harm whatever happens in the State to which the goods are shipped under this child-labor bill. The product which arrives in the other State is perfectly innocent, indeed a necessary and legal article of commerce, and the people at home, in the State of origin, are manufacturing the product in accordance with their own laws and to their own satisfaction. Then, because somebody else in another State is not satisfied with the domestic laws and the exercise of the police powers of the State of origin, they propose to put an embargo on that State and prevent any of its products going out unless they are manufactured in accordance with our standards. Of course, no man is wise enough to say whether or not the Supreme Court will sustain this act. If they do sustain it they will absolutely change our form of government.

Mr. BORAH. They will not have changed it any more than they have in the white-slave case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; a great deal more, I think.

Mr. BORAH. In what respect will they change it? We are dealing with the morals in both cases.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We are not dealing with the question of morals in this instance; we are dealing with the general welfare of children; and I am as much in favor of their welfare as anybody can be, but—

Mr. BORAH. I consider that a moral question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But I am also in favor, if I may be permitted to say so, of preserving our form of government and our Constitution; and if this legislation can be sustained I can not see any further use for the existence of the several States in this country.

Mr. BORAH. That is what was said when the case of Cohen against Virginia was decided.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There have been a good many things said before I arrived here; I will admit that.

Mr. BORAH. The argument was that if the State's judgment could come under the review of the Supreme Court the State governments were wiped out; that we had become one government; and there was nothing for the States to do. I think that the Senator will still have left for the States to deal with all those transactions which are not related to interstate commerce, which is a very large field of activity and a very large field of industry.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Idaho never fails to make his own position clear; but I want to see if I understand just what that position is and what is likely to be the effect of it.

Mr. BORAH. I will not answer for the effect of it.

Mr. WORKS. As I understand, it amounts to this: That because the citizens of a State are manufacturing goods in a way or by a means that the Government thinks detrimental, it is claimed by the Senator that for that reason the Government has a right to close the market for those goods in any other State and refuse the right of transportation to the citizens of the State. That is his position, is it not?

Mr. BORAH. In a measure; but the Senator has not stated it all.

Mr. WORKS. What have I failed to state?

Mr. BORAH. Well, go ahead with your statement.

Mr. WORKS. I have made my statement, and I ask the Senator if that is not his position?

Mr. BORAH. Not exactly; no.

Mr. WORKS. Would the Senator mind saying in what respect his position differs from the suggestion I have made. I am dealing perfectly frankly with this matter, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, and I think he is trying to do the same thing.

Mr. BORAH. I am not complaining of the Senator trying to catch the Senator from Idaho at all.

Mr. WORKS. I have no such intention.

Mr. BORAH. What I contend, to state it over again, is that one engaged in interstate commerce—shipping goods in interstate commerce—must, in order to enjoy that privilege, conform to the regulations of Congress, and that those regulations may take on the quality of police regulations as to all matters fairly connected with interstate commerce. We claim that Congress may in its police power, a part of the implied power under the commerce clause, deny the party the right to ship goods which have been manufactured for interstate commerce by child labor, because child labor is at war with the whole structure of civilized society and destructive of American citizenship.

The Congress of the United States has complete and plenary power over the channels of interstate trade. The only thing which would inhibit them from exercising their judgment relative to what was for the best interests of the people in connection with interstate commerce, would be the fifth amendment, the due-process clause of the Constitution. Is not that correct?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; Congress has power, but—

Mr. BORAH. Well, now—

Mr. WORKS. Wait just a moment. It is not an arbitrary power. If Congress should attempt to prevent the transportation of a perfectly innocent article where there was no offense committed at all respecting it, would the Senator maintain that that could be done?

Mr. BORAH. No. As I have said, there are other provisions of the Constitution, such as the fifth amendment, establishing the due-process principle, which we must have regard to, but, as Justice Harlan asked with reference to lottery tickets, does the fifth amendment protect a man in sending a lottery ticket? Does the fifth amendment protect a man in sending goods which have been manufactured in a way which Congress, as representing public opinion, has come to deem to be contrary to the public interest?

Mr. WORKS. I have said that I have no doubt at all about the correctness of the decision in the lottery case; but my doubt is as to whether that principle can be extended to what we are attempting to do now.

Mr. BORAH. Well, if we can not exercise this power, it is because it is a purely arbitrary power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hesitate very much to interrupt the Senator from Idaho, but it has occurred to me that some of the illustrations which have been suggested are exceedingly unfair, and I desire to suggest a different illustration. We have a Federal law against what is known as peonage. Suppose we would add to that law a prohibition against the interstate transportation of products of the peon, applying to the contractor who employs the laborer. I assume that nobody would doubt that could be done, because our law is connected with the transportation of the peon from one State to another.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the Senator from California would have to deny it if he took the position that he did in regard to child labor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so; but it seems to me very clear that, in addition to punishing the man for establishing a system we could say "You shall not transport what the system produces into another State." But, now, suppose that in the State a system of peonage is established such as is condemned by the Federal law, but which does not require for its establishment the bringing in of laborers from another State. Can anyone doubt that we would have the right to say that the channels of interstate commerce should not be used in order to send out and sell the product of these men held in peonage?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there could be any doubt at all about that—that you could deny the channels of interstate commerce to that use, to the shipping of those goods; and the goods themselves, of course, would be just as beneficial to those who would receive them as the goods which were manufactured by children's aid.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the peonage laws are based upon the fact that peonage is a species of slavery, and is in violation of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. They rest upon that basis, and hence they have no application in this case. Peonage is held to be a species of servitude, a species of slavery, which is condemned by the Constitution except as a punishment for crime.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. But that, in my judgment, does not militate against the argument which the Senator from Iowa has advanced, because what he said was that you might deny the shipment of goods manufactured by peonage labor through the channels of interstate trade. Now, so far as the goods are concerned, so far as their use is concerned, so far as their advantage to society is concerned, and so far as the cleanliness of the channels of interstate trade is concerned, they are just the same as if they had been manufactured by some one who was not regarded as akin to slavery; and the contention which we make is that in addition to the fact of punishing criminals, in addition to the fact of bringing them within the criminal law, Congress may withdraw the instrumentalities of government from the use of those who practice such things.

The practice of the employment of child labor is on exactly the same plane as peonage. It is accentuated by the same spirit and sustained by the same principle as the condemnation of peonage. The goods which children manufacture are just as beneficial to the man who uses them ultimately as if they had been manufactured by an adult. The State may punish the employment of child labor. The National Government may go further and say: "We will aid the States in the punishment, and withdraw the instrumentalities of commerce from your use in order to discourage, to disorganize, and to demoralize the employment of child labor."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that under the thirteenth amendment it is made a crime for anybody to be held in peonage. Now, it has been charged, and there have been investigations, and there have been prosecutions, and there have been convictions in some of our Southern States, I am sorry to say, against people who have been raising cotton there by means of their colored men as tenants, and it was charged that they were held in slavery. Does the Senator mean to say that in addition to the convictions for peonage you can stop the farmer from shipping his cotton in interstate commerce where it has been raised by men who are held in peonage?

Mr. BORAH. I have not any doubt at all but that if the Supreme Court maintains the position which it has taken, the Government could say that no man shall ship an article which has been manufactured—

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us not confine it to manufacture.

Mr. BORAH. Well, upon which peonage labor has been employed to bring it into existence as a commercial commodity.

Mr. OVERMAN. Produced on a farm, let us say.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I have not any doubt but that they could say that in addition to the punishment as a crime the instrumentalities of government may not be used by anybody who does practice this employment of peonage in the production of anything which goes immediately into interstate commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator extend that to deprivation of a man of suffrage?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I would not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President—

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no individual has the power to deprive another of the right of suffrage.

Mr. OVERMAN. I meant whether it would be possible for the Government to deprive him of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is it not true that in the decisions heretofore upon this subject, in the lottery and the white-slave cases, the evils followed interstate transportation and were dependent upon it for consummation? Has the Supreme Court, in any instance, sustained the right to stop intrastate transportation, except where the evil was consummated through interstate transportation? And is not the striking difference between the proposed legislation and the past legislation the fact that now, for the first time, it is proposed to stop interstate shipments where the evil complained of was completed before the interstate transportation began?

Mr. BORAH. The evil in this instance is completed by means of the channels of interstate trade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is, I contend. I contend that it is, because the man could not carry on his business to the extent to which it is carried on by these manufacturers without having a market and the means of shipping his goods. It is positive means by which the man carries on his business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. First, I wanted to get the Senator to answer—and I suppose, of course, he will—that there is this marked difference between the past legislation which has been sustained and the proposed new legislation.

Mr. BORAH. The physical distinction which the Senator makes is true, that the consummation was at the time that the goods were delivered rather than at the time they were being produced.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The interstate transportation was an essential to making the evil possible—an essential to the consummation of the evil.

Mr. BORAH. I maintain that the channels of interstate commerce are essential to the maintenance and the existence and the employment of child labor; that if you deny them the channels of interstate trade there would not be any opposition to this matter here if it were not because of the fact that it is going to hurt somebody, and it is hurting somebody because they can not continue to employ these children unless they can ship their goods in interstate trade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is, however, the distinction that I have stated between anything that has been sustained before and the proposed new legislation.

Now I want to ask the Senator this question: If the new legislation is passed and sustained, then the question of the evil connected with the production inside the State becomes one really for congressional determination, does it not?—and the power would be in Congress to deny interstate transportation to practically anything produced in a State where, in the opinion of the Congress, there was evil connected with its production, and where you wanted to stop that evil.

Mr. BORAH. Wherever the Congress conceived that it had developed to such an extent as to come within police surveillance of the commerce clause.

Mr. HUGHES. An evil, the Senator said.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if it is an evil.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If in the opinion of Congress it was an evil.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; certainly. I am assuming that Congress could not just arbitrarily say that anything was an evil. It would have to be inherently an evil and connected with interstate commerce in a reasonably intimate way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They could not say that having a red head was an evil and base it on that.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But they could say that working a man longer than eight hours was an evil, and therefore that no goods could go into interstate commerce where anybody worked over eight hours.

Mr. BORAH. I believe conditions might arise which would make that true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and they could say that any except organized labor, or the reverse, was an evil and an unwise policy, and that the interstate transportation of the products of any mills that did not recognize organized labor, and so on, and so on, should cease.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says "and so on, and so on," but there is a limit to these things. We have not an absolutely arbitrary Government. It has been the business of the Supreme Court of the United States for a hundred years to define the extent to which the Congress may go or to which State legislatures may go in the exercise of the police power, and, as they have said time and time again, "We can not say in advance what the State may do."

They have been asked to define the police power. They have refused to do it. When this state of facts comes up before them, as it will be there, they will be in a position to say whether or not it has reached the point where it is considered an evil or detrimental to the community.

Mr. President, I realize that in this rambling and interrupted way, in presenting these views as to the constitutionality of this act, I have in no sense exhausted the subject. Neither do I wish to be understood as saying that the question is free of doubt. I claim no more, in fact, than that there is a reasonable doubt under the decisions as to the unconstitutionality of the act. While, therefore, the subject is not wholly free of doubt, whatever doubt exists in view of the decisions, I am going to resolve that doubt in favor of the measure. If my mind were at rest as to the act being in violation of the Constitution, I would, of course, vote against it. I would do so as a matter of plain duty, for above all things are the obligations of the Constitution. I would do so, furthermore, as a matter of expediency, for nothing is to be gained by passing an unconstitutional act. But when there is only a doubt, when it is not fairly clear that the tribunal whose peculiar function it is to pass upon the question must hold the act void, and when the object to be accomplished by the bill is an exceedingly important and desirable one, I find no trouble, in accordance with what I conceive to be my duty here, in casting my vote in favor of passing the bill. I am unwilling to interpose nothing more than a doubt—it would have to be a conviction—between the passage of this measure and the beneficent results which it is believed will flow from its passage.

Behind this measure are among the deepest affections which we experience. Sustaining and urging it are among the tenderest and most searching emotions of the human heart. Only the plainest inhibition, therefore, of the fundamental law should cause us to hesitate when about to realize the attainment of so vital and inspiring an achievement. Only the plain letter of the charter should be permitted to prevail against the passage of the measure. On reviewing the decisions by the court I find principles announced by that tribunal whose learning we all recognize and whose exalted conceptions of modern government many of its greatest decisions unmistakably sustain, which seems to me to uphold the principles of the proposed law. If it should transpire that we are in error or if the court should modify its views as we construe them, our course in the future will be clear and we will at once set about to deal with the whole subject matter in accordance with the decision. If we have misconstrued the court's holding and read erroneously its decision, we will be so advised. On the other hand, if we are not in error as to the logic of the opinions heretofore rendered, the law must, in my judgment, be sustained.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, one remark made by the Senator from Idaho as he took his seat induces me to say a word or two, very briefly.

The Senator from Idaho says there must be a limit somewhere to the exercise by Congress of the powers which it is now attempting to exercise, under the authority of the commerce clause of the Constitution, to regulate commerce among the States. I hope there is a limit. I rather think we have arrived at that limit already. If we pass this bill, I think we shall have exceeded the limit.

I do not think the power to regulate commerce among the States was given to the Congress with any idea of its being used to bring about the correction of evils within the States that could be corrected by the States themselves. My notion about the cause that led the delegates to the Constitutional Convention out of which the Union was formed to give to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States and foreign nations is that it was in order that the channels of interstate communication might be kept open and in order that one State might not, at the expense of the other States, prohibit the use of the highways and the navigable rivers of the State to other States.

Mr. President, this bill does not purport, of course, either upon its face or in the utterances of its advocates, to be a regulation of commerce. The testimony before our committee was that it was an attempt to regulate the hours during which children might be employed in the several States and the ages at which they might be employed. It was only a regulation of commerce when the people who thought that certain States had not adopted laws relative to the labor of children as strict as they should be thought they could compel those States to pass laws to their satisfaction, not by regulating commerce but by prohibiting commerce of that State with any other State. I suppose it will be said that, of course, the power to regulate may include the power to prohibit. That may be so as an extreme definition; but I think it would behoove Congress, when it exercises the power to regulate commerce, to legislate honestly, with an honest intent to do what it pretends to be doing.

Mr. President, if Congress, under the authority to regulate commerce among the States, can say that no goods shall be transported out of a State into another State which were made in a factory where a child was employed more than a certain number of hours per day or under a certain age, on the ground that public sentiment favors the protection of children and the improvement of their condition, it seems to me that inasmuch as there is a great prohibition movement in the country, and a great many people think that the race would be elevated if they were total abstainers from alcoholic beverages, it would be equally within the power of Congress to say that no article should be carried beyond the borders of any State if it were manufactured in an establishment where any liquor was consumed by any of the employees.

A great many people think that it is the sentiment of the country, and the better sentiment, as they say, that woman suffrage should be established. If Congress can pass this law, it will soon be thinking that it could pass a law providing that no goods should be exported from any State that did not give equal suffrage to its citizens. As the Senator from Idaho says, there must be some limit; but seeing through the glass darkly, and into the twilight zone, there seems to me to be no more impassable gulf between the child-labor bill and the bills which would provide for such subjects as I have just indicated than there is between the child-labor bill and the bills about which the decisions have been read recently.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only wanted to remind the Senator that in 1907 the Judiciary Committee of the House, Republicans and Democrats, unanimously reported most vigorously that the limit was passed before legislation of this kind was reached.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that the question of suffrage would in any way relate to the subject of commerce?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; any more than the regulation of the hours that children work in mills relates to the subject of interstate commerce; not a bit.

Mr. BORAH. Not a bit more; but does he think it does as much?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just as much; to my mind, exactly as much. I think the hours which children labor in the local mills and factories and mines of a particular State is as unrelated to commerce among the States as the hour at which the Senator from Idaho is accustomed to get his lunch.

Mr. BORAH. Of course if the Senator views it in that light—if the Senator thinks the employment in factories of children of the age of 8 and 10 years, working all hours of the day and under all conditions, is not a matter about which the National Government is in any way concerned; if he thinks it is not a question which in any way concerns the people as a whole throughout the country, and is wholly a matter for the particular State where the employment takes place—then certainly the Senator is right in his contention.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator knows perfectly well, if he can remember what he asked me, that he did not ask me any such question as that, and I did not answer any such question as that. I did not say that the question of how long children labored, or at what age they labored, was a matter in which the National Government was not concerned at all. The Senator asked me if I thought the question of woman suffrage related to interstate commerce, and I stated that I thought it related just as much to interstate commerce as the hours which children labored in factories related to interstate commerce; and I still think so.

Mr. BORAH. And I conceived, by the Senator's answer, that it was a matter of no concern whatever to the National Government, because if the Senator had conceived it to be a matter of concern to the National Government he would not have said it was of no more concern than the hour at which the Senator from Idaho takes his lunch.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not have said it, and I did not say it. I said it was no more related to the subject of interstate commerce than the hour at which the Senator takes his lunch.

Mr. BORAH. But that is related to interstate commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, they may transport the beef products to feed the Senator in interstate commerce, of course.

Mr. BORAH. I was not referring to the hour at which the Senator takes his lunch, but the manner in which the citizenship of the country is employed with reference to the articles which go into interstate commerce is a matter in which the National Government is concerned, both with reference to the employment and with reference to the shipment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The hours which the citizens of the several States are employed in their mills is of no concern; it has no relation whatever to the subject of interstate transportation. In fact, in many of the factories in the States the product of the factories is used right on the ground of that State. Many concerns are engaged exclusively in manufacturing products which are used in the mill right across the street from it, and they are built there for that purpose. The hours which that concern works its help or the ages which it works its help are absolutely unrelated to interstate commerce, of course, and they may be absolutely unrelated to intrastate transportation. It may not be taken off the ground; it may be used right in the same yard on the premises. So the question of the hours of labor and the ages of labor per se has nothing whatever to do with commerce among the States or with foreign nations over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that the principle upon which the white-slave case was decided is sound?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I can not say it is unsound, because it is the law and has been sustained by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator would be perfectly satisfied with this bill if the Supreme Court would sustain it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not be satisfied with it, but I would not say that it was unconstitutional if the Supreme Court said that it was constitutional.

Mr. BORAH. Why not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should say I regretted they decided that way and that I thought they ought not to have so decided, but whatever the Supreme Court decides to be constitutional is constitutional in this country.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. HUGHES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to either one or to both. I first yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think, then, that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the white-slave case was unsound?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not. I think—

Mr. BORAH. It is the law, but is it unsound?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it went the limit. Between the Senator and myself I think it went the limit, and I think the Senator admits it went the limit, or did until he was prepared to take the next step and go the limit one higher.

Mr. BORAH. I do not concede that I have gone a single step further. I think this law is wholly within that case and previous cases. I do think, as I have said previously and I do not know but publicly, that the Supreme Court laid down the rule there that is as far as the Supreme Court will go, but I think under that rule this law can be sustained, and it does not go a step further than that position.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator thinks so, and I say he is perfectly honest in his belief; but the Senator stated the other day what the fact was, and every Senator knows not only what he stated but what they themselves stated they thought. The Senator said that until the last two or three decisions of the Supreme Court, which have stated that inasmuch as Congress has power to regulate commerce among the States they could not be deprived of it, nor could it be set aside as unconstitutional because in carrying out the power it imposes regulations which might partake of the nature of police power. I say when the Senator has read the last few decisions to that effect he admits his mind is changed, but before those decisions were made he stated here the other day he would have thought this bill was unconstitutional, and almost every lawyer would have said it was unconstitutional, and did say so until then. But in my judgment those decisions, whatever they may accomplish in the way of sustaining the act upon the facts presented in that case, will not make this law constitutional. I do not believe the Supreme Court will say it is constitutional.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I am frank to say it is upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that I base my belief that this law is constitutional.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I said exactly what the Senator said.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. I contend that under these decisions the law can be sustained.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator thinks that these decisions have gone to the limit, I think a little further than the limit, and I have seen the Supreme Court reverse itself, sometimes retrace itself. The trouble about this kind of legislation is that Congress looks around after being petitioned and loaded with requests, all sorts of influences and pressure brought to bear upon it by parties who have organized the propaganda, which may be good, bad, or indifferent. It is a good propaganda in the State, so far as the welfare of children is concerned, but misdirected as to the remedy, in my opinion. The trouble is we do not purport to be doing what we actually are doing. It seems to me that if the police power, which the Senator from Idaho says the Congress must possess in order to carry its power to regulate commerce, is an existing thing it ought to be applied to the regulation of commerce.

The Senator from Idaho says the only reason why the Government has any police power is because it has the necessary power to carry out the powers conferred upon Congress. Then let the police power in regard to commerce be confined to the regulation of commerce, and let us not attempt to use police powers, if they be police powers, to pass a regulation of commerce, like safety appliances, and so forth, and the composition and safety of the instrumentalities of commerce, to compel the State, by a threat of impounding their products and putting boycotts on them as to communication with their neighbors, to change their laws to suit us or to superimpose the superior power of a nation upon them about matters of their domestic concern.

Mr. President, if the principle upon which this proposed legislation is based can be maintained, to wit, upon the theory that whenever Congress from time to time may think it would be for the benefit of the people, and on the ground that the Nation is as much interested in the health of the people of Savannah, Ga., as the people of Georgia are, we can say no products shall come out of any city of Georgia into the State of Alabama unless Georgia shall forthwith pave all its streets with asphalt pavement and promote and protect the health of her inhabitants, or unless its products are made by men who belong to labor unions or by men who do not belong to labor unions, or unless they have prohibition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or unless they enforce prohibition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Or unless they enforce prohibition, and then Georgia would never expect anything any more anywhere. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, Congress has limited itself in good faith to regulating commerce. There is nothing that we can not do if we can say that a prohibition of commerce is a regulation of commerce. Then whenever Congress adopts any standard of morals or any standard in its own mind as to what it is best to do in different parts of the country to promote the health and welfare of the people, under the old general-welfare clause if you please, then they can say unless every State will do this we will put an embargo on your products.

It may be that this is a progressive age, it may be that our Supreme Court has progressed to a point where they will sustain that, but in my opinion the court has to call a halt.

If Congress can legislate by way of embargo on perfectly innocent products of commerce necessary and legitimate to the business interests of this country and can legislate by embargo against a product of a State instead of keeping the channels of commerce open to legitimate commerce, the States will have no power whatever about their domestic concerns. We could just as well say in this bill that no products should be carried from one State to another unless the mill in which it was made had employees every one of whom had had a high-school education. The Senator from Idaho would stand up here and make a magnificent oration about the perpetuity of our institutions depending upon the education of our citizens.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I do not object to the Senator's criticizing my argument, but I object to the Senator referring to my legal argument as an oration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Cicero used to combine them both in one, and I think he was no wiser man than the Senator from Idaho himself. So, Mr. President, while I personally would go as far as anybody else I think to relieve distress or to promote the welfare, especially of little children, I think such projects ought to be carried out in a legal and constitutional method, and I do not think we ought to allow ourselves to be stampeded by the circulars and letters and articles that we see written by benevolently inclined people who do not understand the questions that we are discussing here. I do not think we ought to allow ourselves to be persuaded or to be intimidated by the threats to get votes or to withhold votes on questions of this kind. The form of this Government is at stake, Mr. President, in this kind of legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator concedes, of course, that Congress may prohibit the shipment of any commodity in interstate commerce that is deleterious or injurious.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; per se.

Mr. BORAH. Who is going to decide whether it is or not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Then the sole power to decide that is in Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so, except if it would be, as the Senator says, an arbitrary power the court would look through it. I think there could be a limit and the court could say that Congress had not acted in good faith.

Mr. BORAH. Can the Senator give me an idea where the limit is?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but it would have to be such an extreme case that it would not be a reliable guide.

Mr. BORAH. That is it precisely. The Senator is dealing with that subject matter precisely as we are dealing with this subject matter. To a certain extent the discretion rests in Congress. Beyond a certain point, of course, anyone would denounce it as arbitrary, but within a wide range the Congress of the United States may exercise its judgment as to what is to the public interest and the public welfare and as to what is deleterious. As I said a while ago, as Marshall once said, there is really no limit under certain circumstances to the exercise of power except a change of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be so, Mr. President, and a change of judges of courts, because whether it will stand or not will depend upon the courts. I hope the Supreme Court of the United States would have in view the history of this Government as to what the States have been accustomed to do, what advances have been made under our dual form of government, and the way the commerce clause of our Constitution is being stretched not in good faith to accomplish all sorts of purposes that the National Government heretofore has never been supposed to have anything to do with whatever. I hope it will call the Supreme Court to a serious consideration of this matter.

Mr. President, there is nothing now that any sect or cult of people want to accomplish that they are in doubt about the power of Congress to respond to but what they say "you can do it under the commerce clause." You can not say to the people of the States, "You shall do this." Nobody claims we could say that no State shall allow a boy under 16 years old to work, but they do sometimes get up a theory that it is bad for a boy under 16 years old to work, and that is the sentiment, and if you pronounce that it is bad for him to work, and it would be in the interest of the public welfare that he did not work, then you say anybody who allows him to work shall be prohibited from sending anything into interstate commerce, and we are all the time being urged to do indirectly what everybody admits we can not do directly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut and myself have discussed this question so often in the committee I am sure he will bear with me a moment while I put an inquiry to him. I premise it with this statement of his view, as I understand it. It seems to be his opinion that Congress can not prevent the transportation of anything unless there is something wrong with the thing transported. That idea has been suggested many times. Now, let me ask the Senator, suppose three corporations in the State of Connecticut were to enter into a contract which was in violation of the antitrust law and which was in restraint of trade. That would be a crime under our law. Is the Senator of the opinion that Congress could not say that the product of those three corporations, assuming it to be a perfectly harmless or useful product, shall not be transported from one State to another?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think, Mr. President, that that is a parallel case; but if the Senator wants me to answer now I will do so, or if he wants me to wait I will do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the question I ask.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is a series of questions like that that I think Congress could act upon. In the first place, the Senator has stated a case which is a crime under the Sherman antitrust law. I think that the Sherman Act does prohibit the transportation of goods by such parties now, and I think it would be illegal even if it does not. I am not sure that when a thing is prohibited by a statute of the United States it might not be possible for Congress to do that. While the debate was going on it occurred to me that the United States has a statute against polygamy. I do not know whether Congress could invoke the commerce clause of the Constitution to prevent the violators of its own law from using the instrumentalities of commerce. But those are cases where Congress has undoubted authority to pass the law. This is questioned.

Mr. CUMMINS. The whole antitrust law is founded on the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has no other authority. I only put the question in order to make it perfectly clear that the argument so frequently made here that there must be some unsoundness or some taint in the character or the quality of the commodity transported must be abandoned; that there is nothing in that proposition. It does not follow that this law is constitutional, but the whole suggestion that the thing transported must be in and of itself injurious to the public health or morals or welfare must be abandoned.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may have been abandoned if the Senator from Idaho is right in the white-slave case.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut has just abandoned it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; the Senator has suggested to me the case of the interstate-commerce law, which was passed under the commerce clause of the Constitution, prohibiting certain criminal conspiracies and denying the use of interstate-commerce roads to those violating that statute. I think quite possibly they might be prohibited. I am not sure if Congress, having passed a law against polygamy, might not deny the use of the channels of interstate-commerce communication to the violators of that law.

I am not sure about it, but it does seem to me, as the Senator from Idaho and, of course, the Senator from Iowa will both agree, that there must be a limit somewhere—and we are approaching that limit now—under the authority to regulate commerce, where the disposition to boycott the States of the Union which made this Constitution and created the National Government—the Colonies did it—there must be a place somewhere where the disposition to compel them to pass laws in accordance with the wishes of the Central Government will stop, because, unless it does, Mr. President, the States will simply be automata either to make all their laws conform to our standards and our notions or else be prohibited from receiving from their neighbors any goods or shipping out their own products to the neighboring States. There must be some point, of course, where this stop, or else there is no use of having this dual form of government.

Of course, so long as Congress will continue to pass up to the Supreme Court all doubtful cases, to resolve all doubts in favor of the proposed legislation, we shall simply be, I think, treating the Supreme Court unfairly.

Mr. President, it is not a popular thing to stand up and try to keep legislative bodies within the lines of their constitutional authority where there is a great popular movement for some good cause, and a Senator thinks it is directed in the wrong channel. It is not a popular thing to get up here or elsewhere and stand by one's convictions and stand by the Constitution of the United States as you construe it, and yet we are sworn to do it, and I think we ought to do it.

I can not be honest with myself and vote for this bill. I wish I could. No doubt I should be much more popular at home and abroad and here and elsewhere if I could; but I think it is an unconstitutional bill, and I think the Supreme Court would have said so within a year or two ago.

I do not know what the Supreme Court will say about this bill now; but if we are going to pass up everything to the Supreme Court, shirk all our responsibility in the matter, and vote for measures that we think are unconstitutional, or that we think ninety-nine chances out of one hundred are that they are unconstitutional, I do not think we are treating the Supreme Court fairly. The Supreme Court of this country ought to have some support; but if we are constantly going to throw upon the Supreme Court all the responsibility of setting aside acts we thought were unwise but that we passed in response to public clamor, we are, to a certain extent, depriving the Supreme Court of its right to have the support of a coordinate branch of the Government in trying to maintain the Constitution of the United States.

We all know what effect it has when a high court sets aside an act of Congress or an act of a State legislature the passage of which benevolent people had been able to procure. All the journals of the country, the magazine writers, and the "uplifters," a great many of whom deal in language and not in brains, who know nothing about the law, but are very versatile with epithets, denounce the Supreme Court and say it is time to haul it off the bench and have referendums and recalls and all that sort of thing.

Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States would do its duty as it sees it, and have the courage of its convictions, we should not have so much demagoguery in this country, there would be more respect for the courts, and, in the long run, there would be more respect for Senators and Representatives in Congress.

[Mr. THOMAS addressed the Senate. His entire speech is printed in the Senate proceedings of Saturday, August 5, 1916.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, would it suit the convenience of the Senator from Colorado to suspend now? A request has been made for an executive session.

Mr. THOMAS. I will detain the Senate but a short time in the morning in the discussion of the amendment to which I have referred. I now yield the floor, as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a short speech by Hon. John A. Edwards, of Eureka, Kans., on the subject of the live-stock-marketing problem, delivered by him at the forty-fifth annual meeting of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech made at the Kansas Agricultural Association. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the object of printing this speech of somebody entirely outside of Congress, I take it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is a very prominent cattle raiser in Kansas, and the speech was delivered at the meeting of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture in January of this year. It is illuminating on the subject of the live-stock-marketing problem.

Mr. MANN. How long is it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And it also bears on the resolution now pending in Congress to investigate the packing industry. It is about four and a half pages of this size.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman knows he could introduce it, if he wanted to, before the committee and have it printed by the committee. I shall not object, although I think we are running into the ground these insertion of speeches in the Record.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is a very valuable addition, I am sure, to the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to file the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on House resolution 90, being the resolution in which Representative BUCHANAN, of Illinois, preferred impeachment charges against H. Snowden Marshall. (H. Rept. 1077.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 90, preferring charges of misfeasance and malfeasance against H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the House Calendar.

LILLIE B. RANDELL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed a bill, H. R. 6180, with amendments. I desire to have the bill taken from the Speaker's table and laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill H. R. 6180 with Senate amendments. The Clerk will report it by title and also read the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6180) for the relief of Lillie B. Randell.

The Senate amendments were read.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

LETITIA W. GARRISON.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Senate has also passed the bill H. R. 6181 with amendments, and I ask that that bill be laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6181) for the relief of Letitia W. Garrison.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

LIME-BARREL BILL.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the report of the committee on conference of the bill S. 5425, commonly known as the lime-barrel bill, and move its adoption.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to let that go over for a day or two.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. That will be agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a letter written by the President to Mrs. Henry Smith, of Winamac, Ind., stating the reason why the militia are retained on the Mexican border.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, letter from whom?

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. From the President to Mrs. Henry Smith, the mother of one of the guardsmen on the border.

Mr. MANN. If he gives any light on the subject, I will be glad to have it; nobody else knows why they are kept there. Oh, I read the letter in the press, but it did not give any information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 26, 1916.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your letter of July 23 distresses me a good deal, because it shows that you have not been correctly informed as to the purpose of having the National Guard at the border. It is not for the purpose of drill, but for the purpose of protecting the country. The service the men are performing there is an honor to them and a necessity to the United States. I can not believe that the men in the National Guard would wish to be excused from it or would lose heart because of the discomforts and inconveniences of the service.

The War Department has the camps on the border under the most careful inspection and is using every means known to make them sanitary and safe against disease. The health record of the men on the border, both the Regulars and the National Guardsmen, is exceptionally good.

I would not have you think that I do not sympathize with your distress in the absence of your son, but I beg that you will take these larger matters into consideration.

Sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mrs. HENRY SMITH,
Winamac, Ind.

OMNIBUS PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House omnibus pension bills H. R. 15494 and H. R. 16290 be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments thereto disagreed to, a conference requested, and conferees appointed on behalf of the House.

The Clerk will report the bills by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15494) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of certain soldiers and sailors of said war.

Also:

A bill (H. R. 16290) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of certain soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bills just reported, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees on both bills: Mr. BURKE, Mr. SHOUSE, and Mr. LANGLEY.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, if the House meets on that day, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he may be permitted to address the House for not exceeding one hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Of course, all of this speech making is subject to the usual restriction, which has been stated a number of times.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the district of Columbia for the year ending June 30, 1917 and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Senate the other day adopted an amendment imposing a tax upon intangible property. It seems to me that the House ought to have an opportunity to vote on that amendment.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I agree with the gentleman that that is a matter of enough importance that the House should have an opportunity to express itself on it—the membership and not the conferees—and I will say to the gentleman that there are a number of amendments that I think I can say to him the conferees will not dispose of without bringing them before the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Personally, I would like to have a chance to vote that way.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman from North Carolina think that the bill will be back several times before there is an agreement on it?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am inclined to think so; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Mr. McANDREWS, and Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to put in conference on the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 15947) an item that is not strictly in conference, for this reason: The system that has prevailed heretofore with reference to the limitation upon the expenditure out of lump-sum appropriations for the clerical, drafting, and inspection force of the various bureaus is that we have had a limitation out of the appropriation of the amount that might be expended for these services. In the Bureau of Yards and Docks, on account of the provision put in the bill for the creation of the armor-plate factory and the projectile factory and other matters at the time that the bill was before the House committee, the chief of that bureau has prepared to submit what would be the amount of the limitation. I said to him to have the Senate make the amendment and it would then be in conference. The Senate, instead of adhering to the line that we have always pursued heretofore as to limitations, put in an amendment reducing the amount of those limitations—the amount that could be expended—and they struck out the drafting and inspection force from the language in that limitation and put it under the total appropriation.

The House conferees have not been willing to agree to the Senate amendment changing the policy, and insist that the employment of the drafting and inspection and clerical force shall remain as it has always been, subject to the limitation of the appropriation; and on that account the Senate did not increase the limitation in a sufficient amount to provide for the Bureau of Yards and Docks, but, rather, reduced it. If we adhere to the policy and the legislation that the House has always carried and insisted upon, it is necessary that there should be some increase; and in order to have that in I am asking that that particular amount be put in in conference. It does not increase the appropriation. It only increases the amount of appropriation that may be used for that purpose out of the appropriation authorized in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman a concurrent resolution to offer? The gentleman knows that the House can not confer jurisdiction on the conferees.

Mr. PADGETT. The Senate said they had no rules prohibiting it if the House granted it. Once upon another occasion the House granted this privilege, and it went through all right.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether any Senator knew what the rules were over in the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. PADGETT. They stated that they had no rules fixing—

Mr. MANN. I think it is largely true that they have no rules that they adhere to. I think we ought to have a concrete proposition before us in some way. If the gentleman is willing to take a mere House resolution, then he ought to have his proposition reduced to a House resolution asking unanimous consent. This way would not do any good, because somebody has to reduce this to writing. The Clerk would have to give a copy of it to the House conferees.

I do not understand, I am frank to say, even with this explanation, without examination, what the situation is; but I think the gentleman should reduce his proposition to writing and introduce it as a House resolution to-day and call it up to-morrow.

Mr. PADGETT. There are so many amendments depending on this that we wanted to dispose of it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not apprehend that there are any other amendments depending on it. It has nothing to do with the rest of the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; there is a whole line of amendments that are based upon the change of legislation which they have inserted in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought to reduce it to writing and introduce it.

Mr. PADGETT. Upon another occasion the same thing arose, and I made the request. It was granted in the House, and the Senate acted upon it and accepted it. I am just pursuing the same line that was pursued two years ago with reference to a similar request.

Mr. MANN. I shall object for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12717).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] calls up the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the accompanying statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

Amendment No. 203: Section 9 of the bill provides a penalty for violation of certain provisions of the bill. This amendment limits the penalty to violations "knowingly" committed. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 204 and 205: The effect of these amendments is to provide that the merely careless inspecting, grading, or certification of grain shall not subject the inspector to the penal provisions of the bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 206: This amendment is intended to clarify the language. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 207: This amendment strikes out the definitions of terms used in the bill, these definitions having been transferred to section 2, as noted under the statement relative to amendment No. 147. The amendment also provides that if any part of the act shall be adjudged invalid, such judgment shall not affect any other part of the act. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 208: This amendment increases to $250,000 the appropriation for carrying out the provisions of the bill. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 209 and 210: These amendments are intended to clarify the language. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 211: This amendment provides that the terms of this bill shall not prevent selling or buying grain by sample, regardless of its grade. The Senate recedes, the purpose of the amendment being accomplished by the first proviso to section 4, as amended by the managers of the conference.

Amendment No. 212: This amendment authorizes the inclusion of the requirements of fire insurance in the terms and conditions of the bonds required from warehousemen censed under the bill.

Amendment No. 213: This amendment authorizes the purchase of live stock and the erection of barns and other necessary buildings in connection with experiments in dairying and live-stock production in the semiarid and irrigated districts of the western United States. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 214: This amendment increases by $47,500 the appropriation providing for experiments in dairying and live-stock production in semiarid and irrigated districts of the western United States. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 215: This amendment reduces from $70,000 to $55,000 the amount authorized to be expended for the purchase and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles. The House agrees, with an amendment making the amount authorized to be expended for this purpose $60,000.

Amendment No. 216: This amendment provides that section 5 of the legislative, executive, and judicial act for the fiscal year 1915 shall not be construed to apply to the hire of passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of the field work of the department. The House agrees, with an amendment including the present paragraph within the provision of the Senate amendment. The managers of the conference believe that this amendment as agreed to is in entire harmony with the purpose of the section referred to, and is essential to the efficient conduct of the field work of the department in districts removed from the ordinary means of transportation. A provision of this kind is made necessary by a very recent ruling of the comptroller, and without it the department would have to discontinue much of its work.

Amendment No. 217: This amendment inserts a title for the succeeding paragraph. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 218: This amendment directs the Secretary of Agriculture to submit annually to Congress a statement showing the activities of the department which have been completed and may be discontinued. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 219: The effect of this amendment is to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to grant to the employees of the department who are members of the National Guard such leave with pay as they are entitled to. This will extend to the employees of the Department of Agriculture the same privilege enjoyed by employees of other branches of the Government. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 220: This amendment substitutes the word "existence" for the word "outbreak" in the paragraph making appropriation for the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 221: This amendment reduces the appropriation for the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease from $2,500,000 to $1,250,000. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 222: This amendment authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to make payment for animals and property which he may destroy in combating foot-and-mouth disease and prescribes the basis for appraising animals so destroyed. The House agrees, with an amendment providing that the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1916 shall be available for expenditure during the fiscal year 1917.

Amendment No. 223: This amendment represents an amended total. As the $3,000,000 appropriated by amendment No. 50, upon which the committee of conference failed to agree, is included in this total, the committee of conference consequently failed to agree on this amendment.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution covering the matter which I brought before the House a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 336.

Resolved by the House, That the managers on the part of the House in consideration of Senate amendment No. 40 to House bill 15947 may have authority to increase the amount of $399,000 in conference, and in consideration of Senate amendment No. 145 they have authority to change the word "is" to the words "shall be."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what this amendment is?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not increase the appropriation at all. It is just a redistribution in order to carry out the policy which the House committee reported, and to have the Senate recede from their amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a brief submitted by myself to the Committee on the Judiciary on the H. Snowden Marshall impeachment case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement he has prepared as to the impeachment proceedings inaugurated against H. Snowden Marshall. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object—but I do not intend to object—the resolution was reported this morning. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], if I can, with reference to when it will be voted on? Does my colleague intend to oppose the report of the committee?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Oh, yes. The report of the committee, in my opinion, is erroneous and subjects the committee to just criticism, and will subject this House to public criticism if it is adopted by the House.

Mr. MANN. I did not even hear the report or know what it was. I knew the resolution was reported in this morning. Then it can not be disposed of now?

Mr. WEBB. No; the report is short, and simply recommends that no further proceedings be had on these impeachment charges and that the impeachment resolution lie on the table.

Mr. MANN. I make no objection to the request of my colleague [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield 10 minutes to one of the most efficient and attentive members of the Committee on Agriculture, a gentleman who has justly earned for himself the title of friend of the farmer. I refer to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. [Applause.]

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me just a minute? I want to ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for one hour on the question of the eight-hour day on Tuesday next, following the usual calendar business and matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] he be permitted to address the House for not to exceed one hour on the eight-hour day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes on next Tuesday, immediately following the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], he be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 45 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12717). The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he was a little premature in putting the question. How much time was yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]?

Mr. LEVER. Ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. There is no time to yield. The conference report has been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask unanimous consent to cancel the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think I was the only Member of the House who voted to agree to the conference report when the Chair put the question. I desire to withdraw my vote, and I hope the vote will be vacated.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it ought to be vacated. The gentleman from Mississippi can get time without that.

Mr. LEVER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may address the House for 10 minutes, and I include in that request the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] for 15 minutes. These gentlemen have requested time on the conference report. I am very glad the report has been adopted, but I do not wish to deprive these gentlemen of their opportunity to speak.

Mr. MANN. Is there not a further motion to be made in connection with the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. LEVER. There is.

Mr. MANN. Why can not the motion be made, and then these gentlemen get time on that?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he make that motion.

Mr. STEENERSON. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] have 10 minutes following the other two.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman make my time 15 minutes?

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] each have 15 minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. CANNON. Are these gentlemen to follow the Members who have already obtained unanimous consent to-day? I think my colleague [Mr. RODENBERG] has an hour.

Mr. MANN. I think he will get his time all right. These gentlemen want to speak on subjects relating to the Agricultural bill.

Mr. CANNON. That is all right.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina submitted the conference report.

The SPEAKER. He did submit the conference report.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was not aware that it was to be voted on without discussion. I wanted to ask some questions of the chairman of the committee before the House agreed to the conference report, and the Speaker put the question when the time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] had not expired. I want a chance to find out the effect of the conference report before it is agreed to. It seems to me that that was taking snap judgment on the House.

The SPEAKER. Well, it was—entirely by inadvertence.

Mr. STEENERSON. The action ought to be vacated.

The SPEAKER. Nobody seemed to be wanting to speak, and the Chair put the question on the conference report, and nobody said a word.

Mr. STEENERSON. At that time the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] had the floor.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but the Chair did not know it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then it was a mistake of fact.

The SPEAKER. Why, of course. It was a mistake on the part of the Speaker.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think I had a right to rely on the fact that the question would not be put until the time of the gentleman from Mississippi had expired.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The easiest way, as the Chair suggested a while ago, is to cancel the action of the House in adopting the conference report and proceed in the usual way. The Chair asked unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that that ought to be done. The gentleman can get his information all right—

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. STEENERSON. We may not want to agree to that conference report. It revolutionizes grain inspection.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The vote on agreeing to the conference report is canceled, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is recognized.

Mr. LEVER. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate from the bottom of my heart the very kind words spoken by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be a member, in yielding time to me to discuss the Agricultural appropriation bill now before the House. I am a member of the Agricultural Committee, ranking third upon that committee. I was chairman of the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. The Democratic caucus passed a resolution providing that no Member of the House who had membership on any one of the large committees—in which is included the Committee on Agriculture—should have membership, much less chairmanship, of any other committee. For that reason I resigned the chairmanship of the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, in order to retain my membership on the Committee on Agriculture, believing that I could be more useful to the people of my district as well as to the people of the United States by serving upon the Committee on Agriculture rather than by serving as chairman of the other committee. Being third upon the committee, I was a member of the subcommittee that framed this Agricultural appropriation bill. I helped in connection with other members of the subcommittee to write the present bill now pending and the one for last year and others preceding it. Therefore, I feel naturally a great interest and pride in the agricultural legislation which is contained in the bill which is now reaching the final stages of its passage in the consideration of the conference report now pending before the House.

Since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives I have taken a great interest in agricultural subjects and agricultural legislation, and in increasing the convenience of the postal facilities for the people in my district as well as the people throughout the country.

INCREASED APPROPRIATIONS FOR AGRICULTURE.

Everybody here knows that I do not believe in any extravagance or the wanton expenditure of money, but while believing in economy, still, nevertheless, I have advocated during my service in this House increased appropriations for agriculture. When I became a Member of the House of Representatives the total appropriation for the agricultural interests of the United States was $3,000,000.

I have attended session after session and made speeches at various times in favor of increased appropriations, and I am glad that this bill to-day under consideration at the present time, together with the permanent annual appropriations, amounts in round numbers to the sum of $30,000,000. While $30,000,000 is a considerable sum, it is comparatively a small amount to take care of the great agricultural interests of the United States of America. This great country is but one great farm, because agriculture is the foundation of every other business throughout the land. [Applause.]

The appropriation of $30,000,000 to take care of the great farm which, as I said, the United States of America really is, is a small sum when you remember we produce annually $10,000,000,000 of agricultural products and $20,000,000,000 of manufactured products, making a total production of $30,000,000,000—thirty million is a small amount for investment to carry on a business which yearly produces the sum of $30,000,000,000.

For this reason I have from time to time contended for these increased appropriations, always pointing out, however, that they should be devoted to those objects which will bring the greatest results and benefits to the greatest number of people. [Applause.]

BUREAU OF MARKETS.

In this bill under consideration there is a provision for the Bureau of Markets. It has been increased in this bill over what it was last year, and last year it was increased over what it was the year before. The original item which went into the Agricultural bill establishing the Bureau of Markets was prepared by the chairman of this committee, the Hon. ASBURY F. LEVER, of South Carolina, in consultation with me at the time. He and I sat down at a table together and talked it over and arrived at the language which established this bureau and put it in operation. He wrote it during this consultation, and it was offered to the committee, was adopted, came to the House of Representatives, and became the law of the land. It has begun to furnish the people all over the country with the information they desire. It has begun to furnish them the ways and means of bringing closer together the producer and the consumer, and to eliminate the middleman, so that the producer can get something like the real value of the products he has for sale. [Applause.]

THE FARMERS' WAREHOUSE BILL.

In this bill is also contained the farmers' warehouse bill. I was on the subcommittee which drafted it, and it was reported to the full committee and reported by the full committee to the House of Representatives.

Under this bill the warehouse keeper can receive a Federal license which will secure to the farmers the supervision of the Government, and then the farmer can take his cotton or other product and place it in the warehouse, with the supervision and control of the United States Government behind it, and get his warehouse receipt, which will be a guaranty to anybody to whom he presents it, and he can go to any member bank of the Federal Reserve System or any other bank in the land and secure a loan thereon at a reasonable rate of interest. [Applause.]

It is a measure that the farmers have been asking for, to my knowledge, since I was a boy. They have been knocking at the door and asking Congress to give them recognition, and at last it was left to the Democratic Party to give them that recognition which put the law on the statute book. [Applause.]

FARMERS' GRAIN-GRADING BILL.

Another law included in the appropriation bill is the farmers' grain-grading bill. This is another bill that the farmers throughout the land have been asking for, especially the western farmers, who are more interested in it than are the farmers in my section of the country. Under that the farmers can, no matter where they may be, have their grain graded and have it guaranteed under the supervision of the Government of the United States that it will be correct not only in quality but in quantity and get his just reward for the labor he has bestowed upon it. [Applause.]

GOOD-ROADS BILL.

I favored and supported in this House the bill making an appropriation of $85,000,000 for good roads, which has passed and become the law of the land. Under it every State in this Union will receive help. The bill gives the further benefit of the recognition of the principle that the United States Government is going to help the people throughout the United States and the States of this Union in building highways throughout the country. That will bring as great benefit to the people as anything else on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

THE PARCEL-POST LAW.

Mr. Speaker, I helped to pass the parcel-post law, which the farmers of this country and the people throughout the land were asking for. I did what I could in securing the enactment of that law. The express companies had been robbing the people of the country, and we passed the parcel-post law and gave quick communication under proper supervision and direction at reasonable rates. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The enactment of that law immediately brought about a reduction even in the express rates of 50 per cent and took that burden off of the American people.

THE RURAL-CREDITS LAW.

Not only that, but I supported during the Congresses preceding and in this Congress the rural-credits bill, which the farmers of the land and the people throughout the country everywhere were demanding, and which every political party in its platform had promised. That is now a law upon the statute books, and it will give to the farmers great relief in furnishing them long-time loans at the lowest possible rates of interest.

RURAL DELIVERY SERVICE.

Not only that, but when I came to Congress there was not a single rural delivery route of any kind in the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor. I secured every one that is now in operation in the first congressional district in Mississippi. [Applause.] To-day the rural delivery is blessing the people of that district by carrying daily to them their mail and delivering it to them promptly. No greater blessing has been conferred upon the people in the United States of America than that conferred by the Rural Delivery Service, and I feel happy in the fact that I at least secured this service for my people and secured for them every single, solitary route that is now in my district. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, all this is legislation for the farmer, which has been enacted during this Congress and Congresses that have preceded it, but it has all been enacted under the régime and by the votes and through the instrumentalities of the Democratic Party, of course to some extent with the help of our friends on the other side. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have no hesitation in saying to-day that there has been more constructive legislation enacted during this Democratic administration in the interest of the farmers and for their benefit than was enacted during the whole 16 years of the Republican administration, when they had absolute and complete control of all of the departments of the Government of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore it is easy to determine who are the friends and the real friends of the great producers of the United States.

THE UNDERWOOD TARIFF LAW.

Not only that, but I voted for and helped to pass in this House the Underwood tariff law, which reduced the taxes of the people 50 per cent and put upon the free list for the farmers of the country agricultural implements and bagging and ties and many necessities of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They had been asking for that, but it had been denied them and that act gave it to them; and a few days ago I voted on the floor of this House for a bill that repealed all the stamp taxes on mortgages and notes and deeds and everything of that character that have been of great inconvenience and annoyance to the people.

THE CURRENCY LAW.

Not only that, but I voted for and helped to pass upon the floor of this House the great currency law, which during these troublesome and trying times has kept us out of panic, and during all the days to come by the exercise of the powers therein conferred it will continue to keep the power from Wall Street and prevent panics and we will have them no more forever, and their blighting influences will no longer oppress and hold up and rob the people. [Applause.] Instead of panic, prosperity and happiness will be the lot of the people.

THE SHIP-PURCHASE BILL.

I voted for the shipping bill when it passed this House in a former session of Congress and I voted for it when it passed the House in this session of Congress, because I believe, as I said, that this country being one great farm, producing ten billions of dollars of agricultural products and twenty billions of manufactured products annually, ought to be no longer dependent upon the Shipping Trust, and our farmers and our manufacturers ought to be able to get their products to the markets of the world without being at the mercy of that heartless trust. The Shipping Trust absolutely controls the transportation facilities, and the Government of the United States, with its power, should step in and correct this evil and give the people transportation to the markets of the world at the lowest possible rates that can be obtained. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

INSURANCE BUREAU.

It has been demonstrated that the Government can do business of this kind, because the insurance bureau which we brought into effect to give Government insurance in these war times, has proved to be a paying investment. It has taken care of itself and left a profit of $2,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, these are the reasons why I have been staying here upon the job every day in the Congress of the United States, looking after the interests of the farmers and all my constituents, answering promptly their letters, and honestly attending to their business. [Applause.] I wanted them to have these benefits, and it has been my purpose and desire to do in every way possible all I could to secure them. These have been trying times, and many very important matters have been and are still pending. I have stayed here regardless of my personal interest, although I had opposition at home in my district.

At the beginning of the campaign there were three who were contesting with me. One of them, Hon. Guy W. Mitchell, withdrew early in the campaign and did not participate very much in it, and therefore did not engage in much speech making. Hon. J. A. Cunningham participated strenuously in the campaign for two months, but on the 30th day of July he withdrew from the race and retired from the field. From the information I have he made an honest and faithful and courageous campaign, and he did me the justice and kindness to say when I was a thousand miles away, that if he had been in Congress the same length of time that I had he would have voted just exactly as I did vote on all of these great questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky). The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina to yield me a little more time in order to finish this speech.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have only eight minutes remaining of my hour, and there will be very likely some questions asked of me, and I shall have to consume that time.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire only five minutes additional.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires only five minutes, I will assure the gentleman from South Carolina that on this side we will not object to an extension of his time beyond the hour.

Mr. LEVER. Very well, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Mississippi. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, this is but another evidence of the great kindness and friendship to me of all the Members on the floor of the House, on both sides of it. It gives me much pleasure to say that I have never yet asked for an extension of time upon the floor of the House since I have been a Member or asked for unanimous consent to speak that it was not cheerfully granted to me. [Applause.] I thank you all.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. What kind of opposition is this of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It is opposition for the Democratic nomination. This leaves me with only one opponent, Hon. John E. Rankin, who is still contesting with me for the nomination.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman will do him up, will he not?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That is what my friends say in the first district of Mississippi. [Applause.] He is contesting with me for the Democratic nomination. So far as I am informed he has not criticized a vote I have cast, although I have cast thousands of them since I have been in Congress, and I believe I can say thousands that are record votes in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and so far as I am advised he has not criticized a speech I have made. [Applause.] Therefore, if I have thus served the people during all these years, voting in their interest and speaking in their interest, I do not believe the people in the first congressional district of Mississippi are going to turn me out in the primary election to take place on Tuesday, August 15, 1916. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. They will not; you are too good a friend of the farmer, and the people need you here.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I thank my friend. I know this, that a farmer never swaps off a safe horse in the middle of crop time. [Applause.] And the banker and the merchant and the business man do not discharge faithful employees simply because they have been in their service for many years, and the farmer himself does not discharge the faithful, honest, and conscientious field hand, who day by day labors to produce the very best crops possible on his farm. [Applause.] For that reason I do not believe my people are going to turn away from me when I have been doing all I could for them up here and faithfully laboring for their welfare and for their prosperity. [Applause.] I have stayed here, though, in the face of some criticism, of some misrepresentation, and even in the face of some falsification. There are a few unscrupulous people in my district—thank the Lord, there are not many of them, they are very few—who are so reckless with the truth that I am informed that they have been assiduously and secretly circulating, of course, with the intention, I presume, of making it more public on the day of the primary election, some things which are false. I know my people and they know me, and I am willing to trust them fully. I do not believe a man, woman, or child in the first congressional district of Mississippi will believe campaign falsehoods circulated at or before the election, when I am a thousand miles away and here at my post of duty serving my constituents. I would have been very glad to have gone home and engaged in the canvass, but I could not leave here, and I will trust the people to take care of my interest and see that I have fair play, and I feel confident they will not let me suffer when I have honestly, faithfully, and promptly attended to their business here and in order to do so been kept away from Mississippi and deprived of the privilege and pleasure of meeting them face to face. Of course it would not be proper to discuss in detail here these false reports and I will not do so.

Now, I have stayed here not only to discharge my duty because it was my duty but I have had the further reason to remain here because our great Democratic Speaker, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, and our distinguished Democratic leader, the Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN, and our great and good President, Hon. Woodrow Wilson, have asked us to remain here in order to maintain a quorum that we may transact the public business and carry into effect Democratic doctrines and carry out Democratic policies and finish the Democratic constructive program of our great party. [Applause.]

I have remained here also to help President Wilson in every way I could to carry out his policies and maintain peace and keep us out of war, because I love peace and abhor war.

He is our Democratic President, and he is now the nominee of the Democratic Party for reelection to the high office of President of the United States; and if we have a Democrat in that office four years from next March, it will be Woodrow Wilson, and hence I prefer to do what I can to uphold his hands and help him in the great effort he is making to maintain peace and continue the prosperity which we are now enjoying. I am a Democrat, and I do not want to tear down the Democratic Party or destroy the confidence of the people in the Democratic President. [Applause.] We owe him a great debt of gratitude for the great service he has rendered our party and the country, and it is the duty of every Democrat to stand by him and support him in the discharge of his duties as President and to help in every way possible to secure his reelection for another term.

To demonstrate the great debt of gratitude we owe him, in conclusion let me call your attention to the victories of peace for which he stands as compared with the victories of war. Look across to the other shore across the seas, and you will see nothing but desolation, destruction, and death, the men being slaughtered in war and sorrow in every home, the tears flowing down the cheeks of widows, and the cry of the orphan heard throughout the length and breadth of those unhappy lands. These are the victories of war.

Look now on the other picture in our beautiful country and you will see prosperity and happiness everywhere, our men buoyant and happy as they cheerfully follow their peaceful pursuits to support their loved ones, joy and happiness in the hearts of the mothers and laughter and song in the souls of the children as they see father and brother at home, the birds singing, the flowers blooming, and everybody contented. These are the victories of peace for which we are indebted to our great President. [Applause.] Therefore, in the realization of his marvelous services we will gather around him, uphold and sustain him during the rest of this term, and march with him onward and upward to grander achievements and more glorious developments, if possible, and on to his victorious reelection for another term. I feel sure that my friends in the first district will see to it on Tuesday, August 15, 1916, that I am retained in Congress to help him in his great work, and that I will be with you here, gentlemen, during next Congress to continue our united efforts for the glory of our great country and the good of all the people. [Great applause.] I thank all the Members of the House for your attention and your kindness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on the general state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POW].

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the general state of affairs in the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted [After a pause.] No objection is heard, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the farmers and stockmen of this country that this Agricultural bill that we are now about to pass contains in the clause on eradication of foot-and-mouth disease a provision that in the future will protect them against the unjust rules and regulations that were enforced during the recent outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease. I refer to that clause which provides that "all quarantine regulations" must be "lawful." The inclusion of this word "lawful" is a great satisfaction to us not only because it covers the very point for which we fought when the bill was before the House, but because it will protect the various States against any attempts that might be made by the Bureau of Animal Industry to override State laws by their own rules and regulations.

The insertion of the word "lawful" means that hereafter the Federal Bureau of Animal Industry must conform with the State laws in its regulation of these diseases; or, at least, it means that the farmers can not be deprived of their money simply because they do not obey some fanatic order of any administrative body down here in Washington. It is a vastly different proposition to say that in order to be paid for stock killed a farmer must obey "all quarantine regulations," as was provided in the amendment submitted to this House—the clause to which I objected—and to say that he must obey "all lawful quarantine regulations," as it now is written in the bill. I feel very confident that no one in Iowa will object to this part of the law as it is now written; but practically every one in my district, where we had had the experience we did in this matter, objected to obeying quarantine rules that were not legal.

It was to have this very thing accomplished that we waged such a hard contest months ago, and have been misrepresented thereby since. At that time I insisted that the Bureau of Animal Industry had acted without authority in enforcing quarantines of its own not in accord with State laws. There were some at the time who questioned this statement, but so far I have been unable to find any authority to prove that the National Government has any quarantine rights intrastate, and no one questions their right interstate. To substantiate my statement I quote from Mr. William E. Waltz, dean of the School of Law, University of Maine:

It is universally conceded that quarantine law—that is, laws preventing intercourse for a certain space of time on the part of persons infected, or under suspicion of infection, with others in order to prevent the spread of some contagious or infectious disease—come under that part of the police power which concerns the preservation of the public health. It has been established by a long series of decisions that the police power belongs to the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, and is hence reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

In determining whether a given governmental power rests with the Federal Government or with the States we must start with the presumption that it rests with the States unless such power has been surrendered by the Constitution to the United States, either expressly or by implication, and that the States possess and exercise, except as so restrained, the authority of independent and sovereign States, having exclusive jurisdiction over persons and things within their territory.

It is admitted that the police power is not expressly surrendered by the States, and an examination of the authorities goes to show that there is no adjudicated case holding that this power is delegated to the Federal Government by implication.

In so far as quarantine laws are the legitimate exercise of the police power of the different States as applied to local conditions, legislation along this line rests exclusively with the States, and the Federal Government, in the absence of any power delegated to it expressly or by implication, can not in any way make laws directly dealing with these conditions or superseding to any degree this power originally vested in the States by reason of their independent sovereignty.

It must be admitted that in the absence of an amendment to the Constitution Congress has no power to deal directly with what is properly intrastate and strictly local quarantine, and for many reasons it is well that such is the case.

This proves conclusively that the Bureau of Animal Industry was clearly without authority when it promulgated and enforced those quarantine rules in several States which proved so costly to the farmers. I have been criticized and charged with attempting to deprive the farmers of pay for any stock that might be killed in future outbreaks by raising a point of order against the clause that I did. As a matter of fact, the greater part of that clause which I have been accused of eliminating I did not object to at all. The clause to which I objected was that which simply refers to quarantine regulations, and this was thoroughly understood. This is shown by the RECORD of April 29, page 7099, when in discussing the arrangement of time the following debate took place:

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is the gentleman going to move to strike it out or make any substantial amendment to it? The question of talk is one thing, and I am willing to give a liberal time. If there is a general proposition to strike out or increase, that is one thing.

Mr. KING. I have three amendments that I want to offer in good faith, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] can speak for himself.

Mr. MADDEN. I also have an amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have a point of order and three amendments to make.

Mr. LEVER. It will not take long on the point of order, for I know what it is. How would one hour on a side do on the paragraph relating to foot-and-mouth disease?

Now, what took place on May 2, when this bill was under consideration again and I raised the point of order, was that the chairman of this committee, the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, insisted that the paragraph go out, and he thereby mutilated his own bill to that extent. In making the point of order my object was not to defeat the proposition to reimburse farmers for stock slaughtered, but to perfect the amendment by eliminating the limitation entirely or amending it by placing the word "lawful" before "all quarantine regulations," as it is now written. This is shown in the RECORD of May 2, on page 7251. I offered the following amendment:

At the end of the Lever amendment insert "including the payment of claims growing out of past and future purchases and destruction in cooperation with the States of animals affected by or exposed to or of materials contaminated by or exposed to any such disease wherever found and irrespective of ownership under like or substantially similar circumstances."

This is the language of the bill without the clause to which I objected, and this amendment was stricken out on a point of order by Mr. LEVER himself.

By inserting the word "lawful" we compel no man to obey any rules and regulations unless they are in compliance with the laws of the State in which he lives. It is the object we who fought so long in the House had in view, and we welcome legislation whereby the farmers will be protected from the autocratic methods of a bureau here in Washington.

I want to say that now is the time for this Bureau to prepare to stamp out the next outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. It is a poor excuse for a department such as this Bureau of Animal Industry to say that in an outbreak of an epidemic like foot-and-mouth disease they are not prepared to fight the disease. This is just exactly what we are paying them for, and they should prepare at all times for an outbreak of all those diseases as well known as foot-and-mouth.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For a question; yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. What would the gentleman do in a State, for example, where they did not have any State quarantine law? How would you take care of the situation in that State?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The legislature ought to pass one.

Mr. McKENZIE. But suppose they did not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I did not know there was any State that did not have such a law, but that does not make any difference. It does not justify Congress in trying to do something they can not do.

Mr. McKENZIE. The point I am trying to make is, How would the gentleman take care of the situation, in order to protect the general public, where the State has no law?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What State is there that has no quarantine law? I assume, and think I am correct, that every State has such a law. If not, it is time they had one.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am just submitting the proposition.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But what State? I examined a number of State laws, and did not find a State without a law of some kind on the matter. I found a number of States that did not permit the kind of quarantine that this bureau was enforcing in that particular State.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know of any State, but I am simply submitting the proposition to find out what the gentleman from Iowa would suggest the Government should do in a case of that kind.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Just what I am suggesting now, that their attention should be called to the fact that they have not that law and that they ought to have one. They have a legislature, and that is the duty of the legislature.

Mr. McKENZIE. But the gentleman's contention, as I understand it, is that the State law should be supreme and that the Federal law should be subject to the State regulation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am not contending what should be; I am simply stating what the Constitution permits. You can not change the Constitution and the laws of this country to suit your particular ideas of how best to suppress disease or crime. Those who enforce law must first themselves be law-abiding.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think it could be taken care of under police regulation and for the good of the public health in any State?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. By the State; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In any State.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Already under their fundamental law.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

It may be true that running a quarantine according to the laws of the several States will not make it as easy as if they were run by one central authority, but nevertheless it is the one way you can run a quarantine in the State and run it legally. If the laws of the several States are not as they should be it is time to find it out, and they should do so at once. They will find that the State of Iowa will gladly meet them more than half way; that they are more anxious than anyone to stamp out contagious disease among the live stock. All they insist upon is that the rules be made practical to the conditions that prevail in the State. The Legislature of the State of Iowa, made up, as it is, largely of practical, level-headed farmers, is certainly good authority on all these matters. In other words, the State of Iowa is very willing to cooperate with the Bureau of Animal Industry, and they expect them to aid and advise them, but they do not expect to turn over the lawmaking power on so drastic a matter as a quarantine to any bureau in Washington and allow them to dictate the law. The Legislature of Iowa will unquestionably protect the farmer so that he can sell stock not diseased or exposed to disease. To deny this right will compel the farmer to quit the live-stock business. They will protect the farmer against quarantine laws not drawn in the capitol of the State and against laws that were drawn in Chicago that robbed the farmer by rigging the market to pay dividends on watered stock and which made possible an insurance graft of huge proportions. They will not permit an embargo being placed on business when there is no evidence of disease. They will not pass laws permitting a bureau here in Washington to issue a law preventing the farmer from driving cattle into sheds and barns located on his own farm when a blizzard is raging outside. In fact, their laws will be sane laws and not insane laws. I believe the results we have obtained in this respect on this bill have justified the efforts we have made.

I have had no personal feeling in this matter. The fight has been a long, hard one, but if I have called attention to the great outrage perpetrated by the Government when it ran the foot-and-mouth quarantine, and have made a repetition of it impossible, I shall feel satisfied and consider the time and effort well spent.

Congress has no power to pass quarantine laws, and it therefore has no power to delegate to anyone that authority, and it is therefore illegal and unconstitutional for any bureau here in Washington to assume that it has this authority. For any bureau here in Washington acting with a bureau in a State to presume to trade or pass this authority from the State to the national bureau is just as wrong. The people of the State, acting through their legislature, are the only ones who are qualified to pass a quarantine law under the Constitution as it is now written, and the people themselves are the only ones that can surrender that power constitutionally.

I have the utmost respect for these bureaus of the Government and the great work they are doing, but when they try to become the dictators of legislatures they are treading on very dangerous ground, and it is time that Congress should let them know that they are only advisers of the Government, and not makers of law. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a matter was brought to my attention on yesterday which, if true, is certainly of great interest to the membership of this House. I recite the story only as it was told to me. I was informed that our distinguished opponents on the other side of the aisle in preparing for the coming campaign are having a series of moving pictures taken; that somewhere not known to the ordinary Republican mortal there is a room fitted up somewhat similar to the Speaker's room; and that the Democratic candidate rushes into that room with a roll of papers under his arm, a look of statesmanship upon his face, and after a consultation with the Speaker receives his blessing and departs.

The next place that he appears is in some room somewhere where the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] receives him, and he sits down and consults with him about matters of important legislation, bills are examined, and apparently conclusions of great weight are reached. All this scene of the candidate's familiarity with Democratic greatness is placed upon the reel and is to be exhibited to the admiring constituency of the Democratic candidate and his friends.

This picture is labeled "A candidate is not without honor save in his own district."

Now, I do not know that I have any particular criticism to make of this performance. I think I ought to voice one objection, however. I understand that Charlie Chaplin and Mary Pickford get enormous figures for acting in moving pictures. I do not think it is fair to have the honored Speaker and the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina play the leading part in this greatest of picture performances for an ordinary salary. They are hurting the profession.

Then, there is another thing I would suggest to my Democratic friends. I think somewhere along the line they ought to have a scene with the distinguished leader on this side of the House [Mr. MANN], because then they could satisfy their constituents that they at least have been in a position where they might possibly get inoculated with real information and really know what was going on.

But I understand that there are some group pictures also being made and to be used in this campaign by this same outfit. One of those group pictures consists of our distinguished Speaker, Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. FITZGERALD, showing their attitude, their demeanor, and their humor when they received word that the President had changed his position upon the Panama Canal. [Laughter.] It is said that no one who understands lip reading is permitted to look upon this picture. [Laughter.] It is, I am told, labeled "The Outcasts."

Then the next picture shows a group of distinguished southern Senators. First, it shows them when they received the news that the President had indorsed the legislative program for this session with the child-labor bill left out. The next part of the same reel shows them after they had received the news that the President, after consulting his campaign manager, had come over to the Senate and directed that it be passed during this session. And in this second group, standing well in the foreground, is the distinguished Senator from Georgia, Mr. HARDWICK, reading that noted sentence that was written across the Democratic campaign textbook in 1914, "Thank God for Woodrow Wilson."

This pathetic exhibition is labeled, "We favor one term for President."

Now, the next one, according to the information I have, shows a scene at the White House. It shows one of the Democratic candidates going up there to see the President and receiving his orders as to how he should vote, and then the look of satisfaction and of calm content upon his face as he goes back and notifies his constituents as to how he is going to proceed and what measures he is going to support and how he will vote all in the interest of the people. And the next scene shows him after the President has changed his attitude and he has been notified that he has to vote the other way. [Laughter and applause.] That, I think, is labeled "Innocents abroad in Washington." [Laughter.]

Now, the next picture in the series, as I am informed, represents the President situated at a typewriter, working with tremendous energy in his correspondence with the belligerent nations. It is labeled "We are bound to win if the trust does not corner the paper supply."

Then the sixth on the program consists of four reels. It shows the President in 82 distinct and different attitudes upon 41 important questions—upon each side of all of them. [Laughter and applause.] It is said, even with all the power of machinery and with all the rapidity with which a moving picture can be shown, even then justice can not be done to the original. This is the greatest exhibition of the skill of the lightning-change artist ever exhibited to the American people. [Laughter.] This performance is said to be especially adapted for the movies. It is labeled "Stand by the President."

The last of this series, as I am told, represents the President full armored, with sword drawn, his foot upon the neck of Huerta and waiting for the rabble to indicate whether it is thumbs up or thumbs down.

Then we see our great Navy on its way to Mexican waters; we see it drive out the magnificent navy of Mexico that consists of one old dilapidated gunboat. We see the bombardment of Vera Cruz. We see the crumbling buildings, the maimed and killed Mexicans. We see the seizure of the customhouse and the taking of $1,000,000. We see the flag lowered, the return to our own country, leaving American citizens to be cared for by foreigners. Then we see the funeral at New York of our own killed. We read the magnificent sentences of the President in his funeral oration at that time.

And then we turn to the border. We see the murderous Villa and his victims slain at Columbus. We see the ammunition that has been sent from this country to Villa and to Carranza. We see it used against our own people. We see the massacre at Carrizal. We see the American soldiers marching through the burning sands of the desert and pursuing the bandits that have slaughtered Americans, marching between two parallel lines of railway they were not permitted to use. We see the thousands of soldiers scattered along the Mexican border. We see a procession of American citizens that have been driven from Mexico, of the men that have been murdered in Mexico, and of the American women that have been outraged in Mexico.

We turn and we see at Arlington the new-made graves of our slain. This heroic picture is labeled, "Too proud to fight; or, he has kept us out of war." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as if the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has searched, around and found it very hard to find something to talk about, if he has to go around all the splendid, magnificent, constructive legislation that this Congress and this administration have enacted, representing the people, and instead undertakes to criticize this great work and the President of this great Republic.

I want to say to the gentleman from the State of Washington that he ought to be happy on this great occasion when the conference report of the great Committee on Agriculture of this House has brought out and agreed upon a bill that carries the greatest blessings ever brought out for 38,000,000 of people in the United States, the great farming class of people, who constitute the backbone and the sinew of this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Will you vote for this conference report? Can not you see, sir, in this great bill $30,000,000 for agriculture that is worth more than any other $400,000,000 which Congress has appropriated in the last 50 years? Can you not see, sir, the great benefit that is going into the agricultural-extension work, the great benefit that is going into the special field seeds and garden seeds which the conferees put back into this bill after those provisions had been stricken out by the Senate? Can you not see the great benefit to the cattle raisers, the truck farmers, the grain farmers, and the cotton farmers?

You, sir, are criticizing the President and the Democratic Party. You are talking about back numbers and dead issues in the past. You, sir, are unable to see in our constructive work the great benefits that are coming to the humble homes of millions of poor people and the firesides of the farmers of this country.

I think you ought to rise up with the great mass of the American people and thank God that we have in this country peace, happiness, and prosperity, when all Europe is engaged in war. There, sir, across the deep Atlantic you have the picture of the widow and orphan, with the briny tears running down their cheeks, standing before a grave containing the body of a brave man, killed in battle—for what? Because some crowned king or royal potentate said there must be war, and the great masses, the common people of Europe, are dying daily, sir, in consequence.

You want to see the United States engaged in that sort of business. You have in this country the workingman, the farmer, the business man, and the professional man, all happy in prosperity. Their wives are happy, their children are happy, they have smiles and laughter in their hearts, but the gentleman from Washington can not appreciate that. He can not appreciate what this great party of construction and this great patriotic President has done in keeping this country at peace, in keeping it in strict neutrality, in making prosperity, happiness, and joy instead of devastation, destruction, and despair, according to the ludicrous gentleman from the State of Washington. Thanks be to Almighty God that the majority of men who compose this great body do not have in their hearts the spirit that seems to animate the gentleman from Washington when he delivered that 10-minute utterance just preceding me. Thank God we have a President and a Democratic Congress that stand for peace instead of for war, destruction, sorrow, and devastation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman intend to make any statement whatever as to the conference report?

Mr. LEVER. I would be very glad to answer any questions that may be asked in regard to it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The House conferees appear to have receded from the House disagreements in practically all of the amendments adopted by the Senate to the grain-grading section. I was somewhat curious to learn what arguments induced the conferees to recede, in view of the fact that I had endeavored to secure the adoption of some of these amendments on the floor and in the committee without avail.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will point out some specific amendments concerning which he desires information, I can probably give him the information he desires. I will say this, however, that the House conferees have felt, with reference to the grain-grading bill, that they have receded from the mere nonessential, and have won out on the essential, propositions in conference between the two bodies.

A great many of the recessions as to that bill are with reference to the insertion of the words "interstate or foreign commerce" or "consigned for sale," and things of that kind—simple changes of language. In my judgment they do not amount to a very great deal. We feel that on the essential propositions the House conferees have won substantially all along the line.

Mr. ANDERSON. The amendments that I had particularly in my mind were those beginning with No. 191 to No. 196, inclusive. The proviso as now amended requires the Secretary of Agriculture to issue licenses to inspectors who are authorized to inspect grain under State laws in the States in which they have State grain-inspection systems. I am in favor of that amendment. I tried to have it adopted on the floor and in the committee.

I was wondering what arguments were advanced by the Senate conferees that induced the conferees on the part of the House to accept the amendments, in view of the fact that the bill as originally reported to the House was declared to be so good that it was impossible to amend it in any respect on the floor when it was here.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEN], who was on the floor at the time and who was also a member of the conference committee.

Mr. RUBEN. I will say to the gentleman in regard to these amendments that the bill as it left the House provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should, in issuing these licenses, give preference to the men who inspect the grain in the States where they have grain-inspection systems provided by law.

In effect the Department of Agriculture would do that anyway. So we simply agreed to the Senate amendment, and put into the bill what would have been done by the Agricultural Department anyway.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman's view about that proposition appears to have changed since the bill passed the House.

Mr. RUBEN. Oh, no; the gentleman's view has not changed. The gentleman's view is now just as it was before.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have a very distinct recollection of an attempt to secure the adoption of this amendment in the committee and on the floor without success.

Mr. RUBEN. The gentleman's view and the committee's view may not be the same, but my view has always been that these inspectors ought to be licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture. That is my personal view. The committee thought otherwise, and on the floor of the House I stood with the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, I should like to direct the attention of the gentleman to amendment 174. The House conferees appear to have succeeded in getting the consent of the Senate conferees to recede from that amendment. That amendment, as adopted by the Senate, is very important from the standpoint of States like Minnesota, that have State grain inspection established by law. It provides that the appeal shall be from the final decision in the State; and if stricken out, the appeal will be from the original inspection in the State, and will have the effect of wiping out the various grain boards of appeal in the States.

Mr. RUBEN. The view of the House conferees was that if you had an appeal first to the State authorities and then to the Secretary of Agriculture, you would simply complicate matters. We thought the best thing was to have the appeal directly to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture establishes these grades, and enforces the grain grading throughout the country, and we thought it would be much better to have the appeal made directly to him; and the House conferees held to that view, and the Senate conferees receded.

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me the view of the House conferees on that proposition is somewhat inconsistent with their view with respect to the rest of the bill. As to the rest of the bill the House conferees apparently have been willing to retain the various State inspection systems as they exist in the States now, but with respect to appeals they appear to have taken an entirely different view.

Mr. RUBEY. I will say to the gentleman that this appeal clause, section 6 of this bill, is the only provision in the bill which throws around the inspection system of the country the safeguards necessary to see that the grand standards are enforced, and that the grades are adopted by the various States and throughout the country, and the appeal is made directly to the Secretary of Agriculture in order that we may have uniformity in applying the standards and have a uniform system of grading; in other words, to see that standards are applied uniformly throughout the country.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think you are going to get uniformity in that way, for this reason, that in the case of intrastate shipments the appeal will necessarily be to the State board of appeals, and their decision in that case, I suppose, will be final, while, if it is an interstate shipment, the appeal will be to the Secretary of Agriculture. The result will be that you will have two final decisions, one determination final in the case of intrastate shipments and the other determination final in the case of interstate shipments. Consequently, instead of having uniformity you will have a complete lack of uniformity and a complete disagreement.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman realizes, of course, that a large per cent of the grain—90 per cent of it—goes into interstate and foreign commerce, and the intrastate grain trade is a very small part of the entire amount.

Mr. ANDERSON. However small it may be, it is nevertheless entitled to the consideration of the committee and of the conferees.

Mr. RUBEY. This bill is for the purpose of taking care of interstate and foreign commerce. We have nothing whatever to do with the intrastate grain shipments.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, I have no disposition whatever to criticize the House conferees. I do want to say, however, that in my judgment this bill in its operation will give rise to very serious complaint and objection, and that before it has been in operation very long it will be found necessary to amend it in very many and very material particulars.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture a question.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that the hour allotted to me may be extended 10 minutes. There are several gentlemen who desire to get in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended 10 minutes, so that he may yield to other gentlemen. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. How much do the Senate appropriations in this bill amount to compared to those carried in the bill when it left the House, exclusive of Senate amendment 50, which relates to the purchase of land in the Appalachian forest?

Mr. LEVER. The bill as it passed the Senate, leaving out the Appalachian and White Mountain appropriation of $3,000,000, is about $670,000 less than the bill as it left the House.

Mr. COX. I think the Senate should be congratulated, for once in its long history, on having reduced the amount of an appropriation bill instead of increasing it.

Mr. LEVER. Before the gentleman extends his congratulation, let me say that $1,250,000 of that is a reduction in the $2,500,000 insurance fund for the foot-and-mouth disease, which, from present indications, will not be needed.

Mr. COX. I do not care very much where the reduction comes, so long as it is a reduction. What disposition was finally made of amendment 59, the investigation of experiments for the purpose of determining colors? Did the House or Senate recede?

Mr. LEVER. The Senate committee and the Senate itself restored to the bill the language which was reported by the House committee.

Mr. COX. Then the $50,000 originally carried in the House bill is available for that purpose?

Mr. LEVER. Exactly.

Mr. COX. I think that is a wise provision. Now I want to get information in relation to one more amendment, amendment 65. What was done with that, finally? Was that money turned over to the Agricultural Department, to let them use it as an indeterminate fund, or was it covered into the Treasury?

Mr. LEVER. The House agreed to that proposition with an amendment providing that whatever money might be received should be turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. COX. And I believe the Senate receded from its artesian-well proposition?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] three minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I quite concur with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] that in order to have a workable bill there will have to be amendments to the grain-grading proposition, but I trust that when those amendments are made they will not be made along the line suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota. The real contest in the grain-grading bill has been between two or three States which have already grain-grading laws, and which provide for their own inspectors, and those who desire grain grading as it ought to be by the General Government for interstate and foreign shipment. It has been their contest and fight all along the line. So that when we started out to have governmental grading of grain the grain producers of the country did not want the Government to yield the control of this grading to these three or four States that have great grain markets such as Minnesota, Illinois, and Missouri.

When the first grain-grading bill was put through the House it was made permissive upon the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to license the men who were in the service of the States. Later on the bill which passed the House this term gave them the preference. Now, the final move has been taken by the Senate and agreed to by the conferees of the House which practically gives these States which have the special grain-grading laws absolute control. Because they have the power under the conferees' report to say in effect what men, and only what men, shall ever become inspectors for the purpose of grading grain which goes into interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman will recollect that another section gives the Secretary of Agriculture the right to revoke these licenses.

Mr. SLOAN. That is true, of course.

Mr. RUBEY. It gives him not only the right but it directs him to appoint them, and it gives him the absolute right to revoke the licenses, and in addition to that in another section it imposes a heavy penalty and a fine upon licensed inspectors for any malfeasance in office.

Mr. SLOAN. I desired to make myself plain in this. As it is now under this bill, no man can become an inspector in these States until he has become a licensee from the State. It is true that the Secretary of Agriculture—

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman is mistaken in that. The men who are now employed in the State department will be licensed, but this does not prohibit the department from licensing others in addition.

Mr. SLOAN. There must be a great increase in the amount of grain in interstate and foreign commerce before he will have an opportunity to appoint others. Unless the amount is materially increased the inspectors have nothing to do beyond what they now have. So in the initial selection the men who are to grade the interstate grain under this bill will be those who now grade the grain in the markets and have graded the grain under these State commissions, or whatever they may be called.

Mr. RUBEY. We have thrown around it every possible safeguard that we could, and if these men do not show themselves to be competent, the Secretary of Agriculture can remove them and appoint others.

Mr. SLOAN. That is true; but not every safeguard is thrown around it; the greatest safeguard from a national standpoint would be to place in the Secretary of Agriculture the power to select these men himself. If we are to have a national grain-grading law it ought to be national and not at the dictation of the several States—a grading system which constituted the real demand for the national legislation. If the people of the United States were satisfied with State control of grading, as it has been conducted for the last 10 or 20 years, there would have been no occasion whatever for grain-grading legislation. This report is to a large extent a surrender to the control of grain-grading organizations, dissatisfaction with which prompted this grading legislation.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. If I have the time.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the question has been answered, but I want to be sure. I want to ask the gentleman whether, on page 117, amendments 190, 191, 192, and 193 limit the inspectors to those appointed by the States, or whether, under this bill, the Secretary of Agriculture can appoint those who are not inspectors?

Mr. RUBEY. He must appoint those now employed by States, but he can appoint in addition others that may be needed.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not see that in the bill.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman will find in the last section of the bill, that the Secretary of Agriculture is given the right to appoint as many as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is created under section 5 the board of appeals.

Mr. RUBEY. No; the board of appeals amendment introduced in the Senate was receded from by the Senate conferees.

Mr. STEENERSON. So there is no board of appeals?

Mr. RUBEY. No board of appeals.

Mr. STEENERSON. The appeal is simply to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. RUBEY. To the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it supposed that the Secretary will attend and decide these appeals in person?

Mr. RUBEY. No. I will say in explanation of that that there are in this country 30 or 40 great grain markets, and in each of these markets the Secretary will have his representatives, one or more, as the business of that particular center may require. These men will be experts in grain, and they will pass upon each and every appeal immediately after it is made, so as to avoid any delay, absolutely.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. RUBEY. We want the appeals to be decided at once, so as to avoid delay.

Mr. STEENERSON. It does not contemplate that an appeal shall lie from the Secretary of Agriculture or his representative to Washington?

Mr. RUBEY. No, indeed.

Mr. STEENERSON. That would make unnecessary delay.

Mr. RUBEY. Unnecessary delay, demurrage, and so forth.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no further appeal?

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STEENERSON. The other point I had in mind has been covered by my colleague.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Rubey] for two minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Members of the House in connection with the grain-standards act that this legislation or similar legislation has been pending in Congress for many years. There are two schools of thought. One that which seeks to have Government inspection and the other that which seeks to have Government supervision. The bill which we have passed, and which we are agreeing to here to-day, is a bill providing for Government supervision over grain grading throughout the country. The bill as it passed the House, and as it has been agreed to in conference, is, in my opinion, a most excellent measure, will meet the conditions of the country, and will prove satisfactory to everyone who has to do with grain, from the man who produces it on the farm to the miller who converts it into flour, or to the grain dealer who ships it into foreign lands. I believe that the passage of this act marks a great advance step along the line of the establishment of Government standards for agricultural products. I am satisfied that it will be acceptable to the people of the country.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why does the gentleman say that this gives merely supervision of inspection? It seems to me that it provides for inspection.

Mr. RUBEY. It provides, in the first place, for the establishment of grain standards. Then the Secretary of Agriculture licenses men throughout the country to grade the grain. In States which have State grain inspection established by law the inspectors are employed by the States and paid by the State; in other States the inspectors are employed, but paid by boards of trade and chambers of commerce, as at present. The Government itself comes in as a supervisor of the grading in each one of the great grain markets, so that in reality instead of the Government appointing thousands of men and paying them salaries to go out and grade grain in every part of the country this bill simply provides for supervision of the grading of grain by men appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and these men will see that the standards are applied correctly and justly and that the grain is given the grade that rightly belongs to it.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me that when the Secretary decides the appeal he actually grades the grain.

Mr. RUBEY. No; when he decides the appeal he simply passes upon the work done by these grain graders or inspectors.

Mr. STEENERSON. And they are his own subordinates.

Mr. RUBEY. And exercise supervision over the grading. Not only that, but when this law gets into full operation, and as these men are employed in first one market and then another and are being transferred from one market to another, supervising the grading in one place and then supervising it in another, they will naturally unify the system and bring about a uniform application of the grain standards throughout the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 50, by Mr. LEVER:

"I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 50, and agree to the same."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 50, and agree to the same.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There are four amendments that were not agreed to. They are all dependent upon this amendment. Could we not have, by unanimous consent, a motion covering all four of the amendments?

Mr. LEVER. I thought if my motion should prevail, then it would be necessary to make further motions with reference to these other amendments; but if my motion should be voted down, then another motion would not be necessary with respect to these other amendments.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but why should we not have an agreement that the motion should cover all four of the amendments? They are all the same thing.

Mr. LEVER. No; they are not the same. The other motions that I should make would be to concur in the different Senate amendments with an amendment, so as to correct the totals.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 50.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following motion. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 54, by Mr. LEVER:

"I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate No. 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate amendment insert $8,549,735."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 54 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Also the following motion:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 112, by Mr. LEVER:

"I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate amendment, insert $25,125,852."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 112 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. I also offer the following motion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 223, by Mr. LEVER:

"I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 223, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate amendment, insert $26,948,852."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 223 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record upon the Agricultural bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on Senate amendment No. 50.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARK of Florida). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Speaker, when the present session of Congress comes to an end legislation of great importance to the country will have been enacted into law. Since the opening of the Sixty-second Congress in 1911, the first Democratic Congress since 1895, more reform and progressive legislation, more legislation for the benefit of the great masses, have been placed on the statute books than in any period of our history. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Because of a Democratic administration at Washington we now elect United States Senators by popular vote, and we have a publicity law which insures the honest election of Senators and Representatives.

We have the income tax, which places the burden of taxation on those best able to pay, and nets to the Treasury nearly $140,000,000 a year. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have the Underwood tariff law, the first honest downward revision of the tariff in a quarter of a century, and we will have a nonpartisan tariff commission which will prevent the tariff from being used as a football of politics in the future. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have a new banking and currency system which has emancipated the American people from the money changers of Wall Street.

We have the Federal Trade Commission and the Clayton anti-trust law for the protection of honest business men and the encouragement of honest business.

We have passed a law for the physical valuation of railroad properties in order to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix just passenger and freight rates.

We have enacted liberal pension laws to take care of the old soldier and his widow in their old age.

And what about the 25,000,000 men in this country who labor by the sweat of their brows? For years they have been petitioning Congress for legislation, but not until after the election of a Democratic majority in the Sixty-second Congress were these petitions heard.

We have a Secretary of Labor, and labor now occupies a prominent position at the President's Cabinet table.

We have an eight-hour law on works done for the Government as well as work done by the Government.

We have the children's bureau for the protection and welfare of the youth of the country, and we will have a child-labor law.

We now have laws for the safety and protection of workmen in hazardous occupations, such as the phosphorous match act, the Bureau of Mines act, and Bureau of Safety Appliances.

We now have a seaman's law which has liberated the seamen, and we have exempted labor unions from the operation of the antitrust law, thereby liberating the laboring man and elevating him above property and the almighty dollar.

We created a Commission on Industrial Relations, whose recent report is opening the eyes of the country to our industrial problem; and we have passed a law providing for a Board of Mediation and Conciliation which has successfully adjusted differences between employers and employees.

We have given to labor a trial by jury in contempt cases and limited the use of the injunction in labor disputes.

We have elevated the post-office employees to the plane of free American citizens by removing gag rules that were promulgated by President Roosevelt and President Taft.

The House has passed a workman's compensation bill, and a bill providing for the retirement of superannuated postal employees has been favorably reported from a House committee and is now on the calendar of the House.

And for the farmers of the country—besides all the progressive and reform legislation, we have extended the Rural Free Delivery System and established a Parcel Post System.

We have given the farmer a rural-credit system for which he has been begging for so these many years.

We have passed a bill for agricultural extension work, a warehouse bill, and a bill to stop gambling in farm products.

We have enacted a good-roads law which extends Federal aid to road building.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KONOP. Yes, sir.

Mr. DENISON. I noticed in enumerating the various laws I did not understand my colleague to mention the immigration bill. Was that omitted intentionally or by oversight?

Mr. KONOP. It has not become a law yet.

Mr. DENISON. I know, but the gentleman has mentioned several others that have not become laws.

Mr. KONOP. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The child-labor bill has not become a law; the corrupt-practices bill has not become a law.

Mr. KONOP. We have now a publicity law, but the new law has passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. DENISON. But I am just wondering if my colleague omitted that by oversight or intended to mention that.

Mr. KONOP. I can mention that if the gentleman wants me to do so.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KONOP. Certainly.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Did the Republican Party during its tenure of 16 years pass an immigration bill or any of the other bills to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. KONOP. I do not think so.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman referred to the parcel-post law. The gentleman is aware of the fact that was passed during the Taft administration and took effect the 1st of January before this Democratic administration—

Mr. KONOP. But it did not pass until we got a Democratic Congress here. The gentleman's party were here for 16 years and did not enact it into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is exaggerating. The Senate was the body that was—

Mr. KONOP. Yes; but none of this legislation which might have been considered and passed was passed and became a law until you had a Democratic Congress here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to say to the gentleman—

Mr. KONOP. I do not yield further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, such is the record of achievement in legislation of the Democratic Party. In the past you have charged that party with obstruction. You have charged us with being a party of negation. You have unjustly charged us with causing business calamity and depression. You have bragged about a prosperity that was trust made and subservient to big business. You have talked about the full dinner pail.

And what about to-day? Under a Democratic administration we are enjoying the greatest prosperity in the history of our country, not a temporary trust-made prosperity, but a lasting prosperity; a prosperity for all; a prosperity for both big and small; a prosperity of freedom and equality among our business men and people. I challenge a comparison of the record of the Democratic Party for constructive legislation with that of any party at any time. I challenge a comparison of the prosperous condition of the country to-day with that of any period of our history. For 16 years you have been in power. You have had control of every department of Government. Why did not you pass this legislation? What do you offer now? What constructive legislation do you promise to enact if you are returned to power? Your platform that you have adopted at Chicago can be condensed into one resolve: "Whereas you are in and we are out, therefore be it resolved that you get out and let us in." You are looking for the jobs and offer no service to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not all. When this session ends we will have provided for the protection, security, and lasting peace of a hundred million people. We will have provided an Army and a Navy sufficient and able to protect the interests and honor of our Republic and of its citizens everywhere. We do not want war. These preparations are not for war. These are preparations against war. We love peace. God grant that there will never be another war. But why are we unprepared? Who is responsible for this condition? Who has been in power for 16 years before the Wilson administration? At no time in the history of our country has any administration equaled the present in the matter of providing adequate national defense. In spite of the boisterous noise and bluster of his predecessors about our Army and Navy, it was President Wilson who, by his patriotism and great leadership, has called the attention of the country to our unprepared condition and created a demand for adequate national defense. President Wilson stands as an incomparable giant among the leaders of the movement for national defense, national unity and security.

Mr. Speaker, while making adequate preparations against war, the greatest achievement of the administration is that our great leader has kept us at peace with the world. While civilized Europe has been involved in the greatest slaughter of humanity during the past two years, President Wilson has kept us at peace. Time and time again during the past three years arose occasions that "tried men's souls." Calm, patient, and patriotic, the President has never wavered. He has triumphantly piloted the ship of state through a most angry sea. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the eve of a great election misrepresentations are and will be made. Facts are distorted; nationality will be arrayed against nationality; creed against creed. Charges of bad faith, lack of wisdom, lack of courage and patriotism, and want of neutrality are and will be heard from the platform and appear in the hostile press. All for one purpose. All for the purpose of befogging the issue and defeating for reelection a man who has kept us at peace and insured prosperity. But, Mr. Speaker, the American people know where Woodrow Wilson has stood and where he stands to-day. He stands for America "first, last, and all the time," and for peace and prosperity to her people.

In the handling of the Mexican question you charge him with weakness. I deny the charge. It takes strength to do right when it is popular to do wrong. You say he has been too patient. Thank God that he has been patient and prudent and has kept us out of war with that unfortunate country. Do you think it would have been any honor to our flag for a country of 100,000,000 to fight 15,000,000 half-civilized Indians? You say that the President has been wrong. In what particulars has he been wrong? What would you have done in that delicate situation? What will you do should you—God forbid—be placed into power? Will you go to war? You can not win on a general charge like that. The American people demand particulars. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the handling of the foreign relations with belligerents in Europe, the pro-English have been charging the President with weakness for not going to war with Germany, and the pro-Germans have been charging him with partiality and unneutrality. Has the President been right in these controversies? All belligerents admit it. Germany admits it. The allies admit it. All belligerents know that Woodrow Wilson has stood for international law and international rights. You say he has been wrong. In what particular has he been wrong? What would you have done? Would you have gone to war? The American people will demand that you make your charges more definite and certain. No, Mr. Speaker; the people know that President Wilson's handling of international affairs has kept us at peace and has redounded to the honor and glory of our country.

In the present campaign every effort is being made to line up the German-American vote against the President. Everything is done to misconstrue the President's attitude and his utterances. There is much idle talk about the hyphen. Charges are made that the President has accused German-Americans of disloyalty. I deny that charge. No act nor utterance that the President has made can be so construed. Let me quote to you the President's words on different occasions that are being misconstrued for political purposes.

At the unveiling of the Barry Monument at Washington on May 16, 1914, two and a half months before the outbreak of the European war, in the course of his address, President Wilson said:

John Barry was an Irishman, but his heart crossed the Atlantic with him. He did not leave it in Ireland. And the test for all of us, for all of us had our origins on the other side of the sea, is whether we will assist in enabling America to live her separate and independent life, retaining our ancient affections, indeed, but determining everything that we do by the interests that exist on this side of the sea. Some Americans need hyphens in their names because only part of them has come over; but when the whole man has come over, heart and thought and all, the hyphen drops of its own weight out of his name. This man was not an Irish-American. He was an Irishman who became an American. I venture to say he voted with regard to the questions as they looked on this side of the water and not as they looked on the other side; and that is my infallible test of a genuine American, that when he votes, or when he acts, or when he fights his heart and his thought are centered nowhere but in the emotions and purposes and policies of the United States.

Can any American citizen, of whatever race or nationality, take offense at such a plea for national unity and undivided loyalty? Now, let me quote to you from the President's message in December, 1915:

There are citizens of the United States, I blush to admit, born under other flags but welcomed under our generous naturalization laws to the full freedom and opportunity of America, who have poured the poison of disloyalty into the very arteries of our national life; who have sought to bring the authority and good name of our Government into contempt, to destroy our industries wherever they thought it effective for their vindictive purposes to strike at them, and to debase our politics to the uses of foreign intrigue. Their number is not great as compared with the whole number of those sturdy hosts by which our Nation has been enriched in recent generations out of virile foreign stocks, but it is great enough to have brought deep disgrace upon us.

And further, he said:

There are some men among us and many resident abroad who, though born and bred in the United States and calling themselves Americans, have so forgotten themselves and their honor as citizens as to put their passionate sympathy with one or the other side in the great European conflict above their regard for the peace and dignity of the United States. They also preach and practice disloyalty.

On February 23, 1916, he said this to a committee of Hungarians who called at the White House:

I have never doubted for a moment the feeling that gentlemen such as yourselves have for America. I recognize you as just as much Americans as anybody born in this country. I have deplored, and I am sure you have united with me in deploring, the spirit which has been manifested by some who have misrepresented those for whom they professed to speak, and my public protests have been against what they said and against their misrepresentations of what I felt sure was the sentiment of the rank and file of those Americans born on the other side of the water who have come and enriched America by giving her their talent and their work and their allegiance.

On May 2, 1916, the President spoke as follows:

You have heard a great deal about the hyphen. I, for one, have never been deceived. The number of persons of really divided allegiance in this country is very small, and if I had been born in some other country I would, for one, resent the representations which have been made by those who were not the spokesmen of those for whom they pretended to speak in suggesting a divided allegiance.

On Memorial Day, 1916, at Arlington, he said this:

We have no criticism for men who love the place of their birth and the source of their origin. All that we do criticize is that in some instances—they are not very numerous—but in some instances men have allowed this old ardor of another nationality to overthrow their ardor for the nationality to which they have given their new and voluntary allegiance.

On Flag Day the President used these words:

There is disloyalty in America. It proceeds from a minority, a very small minority, but a very active and subtle minority. It works underground, but it also shows its ugly head where we can see it, and there are those at this moment who are trying to levy a species of political blackmail, saying, "Do what we wish in the interest of foreign sentiment or we will wreak our vengeance at the polls." That is the sort of thing against which the American Nation will turn with a might and triumph of sentiment that will teach these gentlemen once for all that loyalty to the flag is the first test of tolerance in the United States.

And, again, June, 1913, he said:

Certain men—I have never believed a great number—born in other lands have in recent months thought more of these lands than they have of the honor and interest of the Government under which they are now living. They have even gone so far as to draw apart in spirit and in organization from the rest of us to accomplish some special object of their own. I am not here going to enter any criticism of these people, but I do want to say this, that such a thing as that is absolutely incompatible with the fundamental idea of loyalty, and that loyalty is not a self-pleasing virtue. I am not bound to be loyal to the United States to please myself. I am bound to be loyal to the United States because I live under its laws and am its citizen, and, whether it hurts me or whether it benefits me, I am obliged to be loyal.

Mr. Speaker, these are the utterances of a typical American President. These utterances plead for unity in America and loyalty to America. The President has not attacked German-Americans. He has not attacked British-Americans, French-Americans, nor any other Americans. The President has attacked a few American citizens for disloyalty to America. His words apply to all citizens who are disloyal. A British-American, a French-American, a German-American, an Italian-American, or any other American who is disloyal to the American Republic by placing the interests of some foreign country against those of America is the one singled by the President. The President clearly differentiates between the loyal citizens of every blood and race and those who are disloyal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Political enemies may twist and distort these statements and try to prejudice the German-American voters of this country against the President. A few leaders in the German-American Alliance may frame up resolutions against him; but the great mass of men of German blood, men whose patriotism and loyalty to this country have been demonstrated and never questioned—these men will not falter; they will not let their loyalty to their country be made a footstool of politics. Typical of these patriotic citizens of German blood and the finest example of American citizenship is Gen. Frederick C. Winkler, of Milwaukee. A representative German-American, a soldier who fought for the Union, a lifelong Republican, Gen. Winkler sent the following telegram to President Wilson:

Have read your New York Press Club address with great satisfaction. A Republican voter since 1860, I hold that in the present crisis the party has no place. True Americanism must stand by the man who manfully stands at the helm. I support your reelection.

JULY 4, 1916.

F. C. WINKLER.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me quote what the Waldbote, a German weekly of Medford, Wis., says about the misrepresentation of President Wilson's remarks for political purposes:

Party politics are the sole motive of misinterpreting the reference of President Wilson to disloyal citizens. But there are writers and public speakers who are demagogues enough to do such a monstrous injustice to the President of the United States as a means to their political ends.

President Wilson declared on two different occasions and said practically the same thing in the Democratic national platform, "that there exists in the United States a small number of such, who conspire for the purpose of advancing the interests of foreign countries and to the prejudice of our own country." The President said explicitly that the number was only small and designated no nationality.

But, orally and in writing, it is preached to the German-Americans of the whole country for party political ends that President Wilson means exclusively German-Americans and all German-Americans.

The purpose back of such demagogic substitution of a false interpretation to the words of the President is clear. It is a monstrous injustice.

Let us be just.

On the efforts to deliver the German-American vote against the President, the same German paper says:

German-Americans are not poll cattle. They will vote independently, and the Waldbote believes that the Democratic Party will lose fewer German-American votes than the Republican Party. Many German Republicans will vote for Wilson, because he kept the country out of war, while they know that under any Republican administration it would have been involved long ago.

Mr. Speaker, we have a great country. We are a great cosmopolitan people. Our country is made up of all the peoples of Europe. We have the English and the Scotch; we have the sturdy, stalwart Scandinavian, the romantic Italian; we have the industrious German, the versatile Irishman; we have the polished Frenchman, the progressive Belgian and Hollander; we have the hard-working Poles and Bohemians, the despised Greeks, and the persecuted Jew. They all came to our shores. They make up a new people, a new race, a new nation. Under a free Government they have builded a grand Nation, the brightest star in the galaxy of nations. They love their home, their country, their flag. Should they divide now into a confederation of nationalities? When there is danger to our national unity; when for political purposes, men here and there, through organized effort, try to ally nationality against nationality; when men put alien interests above those of this Republic, should not the President, the spokesman of all these people, plead in behalf of undivided allegiance to but one country and one flag?

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party enters upon a campaign for true Americanism. It presents a record of achievement unequalled in any period of our history. It presents a candidate that has championed the cause of true Americanism and peace, preparedness, and prosperity. It presents a statesman who has kept faith and made good. All it asks is justice at the hands of patriotic American citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, now I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks concerning some tabulations of wage increases in the past few years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted to my colleague be extended for one-half an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] be extended for one-half an hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I follow the gentleman from Illinois, and I asked for only 30 minutes the other day. I think I will need about 20 minutes, and I ask for 30 minutes additional.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from Alabama prefer to continue this afternoon or to proceed the first thing to-morrow?

Mr. HEFLIN. Do we meet to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. We will have a meeting to-morrow. There are several gentlemen allotted time this afternoon, and we will meet to-morrow and they will have an opportunity to proceed. It will be pretty late this afternoon, but the gentleman can determine later. He has his hour anyhow.

Mr. HEFLIN. All right, I will determine later, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House [applause], four years ago, owing to a most unfortunate division in the ranks of the Republican Party, Woodrow Wilson was elected President of the United States by a minority vote of the people and with him there came into power a Congress Democratic in both branches. For 16 years prior to 1912 the Republican Party had been in complete control of the destinies of the Nation, and during that time it made a record of patriotic achievement unparalleled in all the annals of political history. [Applause on the Republican side.] Prosperity was at high tide in every branch of human endeavor. Labor was steadily employed at the highest wages ever paid. The farmer received good prices for his products, the merchant was happy and contented, the manufacturer had an abundance of orders, the banks had plenty of money which they were prepared to loan at reasonable rates of interest, the hum of legitimate industry was heard throughout the length and breadth of the land, and the American flag commanded profound respect wherever it was unfurled to the breeze. [Applause on the Republican side.] At no time in the history of this Republic were the American people more prosperous than during those 16 years of uninterrupted Republican control. Our population rose from 70,000,000 to approximately 95,000,000. The savings of the people, the real test of material prosperity, increased from two billion to four and a half billion dollars and our national wealth from seventy-seven billion to a hundred and eighty billion dollars. No nation on earth and no political party that has ever existed since governments were instituted among men can present a record that begins to compare with the marvelous achievements of the Republican Party from the inauguration of William McKinley in 1897 to the close of the administration of William Howard Taft in 1913. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, strange and anomalous as it may seem, it was this very unprecedented and unparalleled prosperity that was responsible for the overthrow of Republican supremacy and for the installation of a Democratic administration. The American people are in some respects a peculiar people. They are always restless and they are never entirely satisfied. They are constantly looking for something new, and when they have found it they are willing to experiment with it simply because it is new; and especially is this true when everything is moving along smoothly and there are no signs of impending disaster in the skies. It is then that the demagogue appears upon the scene. It is then that the agitator flourishes. It is then that successful appeal is made to passion and to prejudice and seeds of discontent are sown in fertile and productive ground. It is then that the finger of suspicion is pointed at everybody and everything and men for the first time in their lives question the honesty and integrity of their friends and neighbors. It is then that honor is assailed, that motives are impugned, that confidence is destroyed. It is then, too, that we are in a receptive mood and lend willing ear to the man who talks glibly of "pitiless publicity" and the "new freedom."

Yes, my friends, when times are good, when work is plentiful, when the job is looking for the man, when we are surrounded on all sides by abounding prosperity, it is then that the average American feels his independence and welcomes an opportunity to manifest that feeling by voting to upset the established order of things. We had become so accustomed to prosperity under Republican rule that we accepted that prosperity as a mere matter of course and forgot to give credit to whom credit was due. We simply grew indifferent to our own welfare and permitted ourselves to be lured upon the rocks of disaster by the siren song of the impractical theorist who feeds us on fancy instead of fact, on promise instead of performance, and who would have us believe that a flight of rhetoric is more sustaining than a slice of roast beef. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But suddenly we awake with a start. The dream is over. We rub our eyes and look about us. We take an inventory of our melancholy surroundings, amid the wreck and ruin of our national hopes and aspirations, and then we ask ourselves why we were ever so foolish as to let go of those principles and policies which have stood the test of time and experience in order to follow a political will-o'-the-wisp. That is a question that the thinking people of this country who permitted themselves to take a political joy ride four years ago are asking themselves to-day, and that is the question that our Democratic friends are called upon to answer.

The Democratic Party is now in full control of the Government. They are in full charge of both the executive and legislative branches, and at this very time, in utter defiance of every consideration of elementary decency, they are even trying to get control of the judicial branch by advocating the passage of a bill now pending in the Senate which would empower a partisan President to remove from office some thirty-two Federal judges of admitted probity and recognized ability in order to make room for "deserving Democrats." Having full control of the Government, the Democratic Party is properly chargeable with full responsibility for everything that has been done or left undone, and they can not escape that responsibility. The day of reckoning is at hand. For the first time in many years they are called upon to give an account of their stewardship and to satisfy the American people that they are entitled to a continuation of public confidence. Can they do so? Let us see.

Four years ago our Democratic friends made certain direct and specific promises to the wage earners of this country. They promised the men who work in the mills, in the mines, in the factories, and on the farms—the men who earn their bread in the sweat of their brows—that if they were successful in wresting control of the Government from the Republican Party they would place upon the statute books certain economic laws which would bring increased prosperity to every American home and every American fireside. Has that promise been kept? Has the Underwood Democratic tariff law proven a benefit or an injury to the wage earner? Has it increased or decreased his opportunities for employment? Has it directly or indirectly been the means of establishing a single new industry in any State in this Union? Has it created a market anywhere within the confines of the Republic for the only commodity that the workingman has to sell, namely, his labor? No; no—a thousand times, no! From the day that the Underwood tariff law went into effect, on October 19, 1913, until the spring of 1915, when we first began to feel the stimulating effect of the tremendous orders for European war supplies, complete industrial paralysis rested like a blight upon every part of our common country. Starvation and stagnation confronted us on all sides. The mines quit working, the mills and factories closed their doors, and across their silent and smokeless chimneys was written the epitaph, "Died of an overdose of the Underwood bill." [Applause on the Republican side.]

A half million men in New York alone were compelled to patronize the bread line, and 200,000 in the city of Chicago paid daily visits to that one institution that always springs into existence under a Democratic administration, the free soup house.

Every railroad sidetrack in this country was filled with long strings of empty freight cars, and the rabbits built their nests and bred their young in the weeds that covered the roadbeds.

Our imports from abroad increased by leaps and bounds, and there was as much joy and rejoicing among the manufacturers of Europe as there was gloom and despair among the manufacturers of America. Our custom revenues fell off, wages were cut, dividends were passed, bank clearings decreased, credit was destroyed, and failure became the order of the day. Compared with the last year of a Republican administration the gross earnings of the railroads alone fell off more than 4½ per cent in the first year of the Wilson administration, and iron productions decreased more than 25 per cent. The steel mills of this country were reduced to 40 per cent of their normal capacity, two-fifths of all the looms in our woolen mills were idle, and $40,000,000 of capital invested in cotton mills became unproductive, while the importation of cotton cloth from abroad almost doubled in quantity.

But just as the sun of our prosperity was about to pass into complete eclipse, just as hope was about to give way to blank despair, our drooping spirits were revived and our saddened hearts were cheered by the comforting assurance of our amiable ex-Princeton professor that all our depression was purely psychological, a state of mind. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Well, that helped some. [Renewed laughter on the Republican side.] Of course it did not pay the rent, or buy schoolbooks or clothing for the little ones at home. It did not pay doctor's bills or grocer's bills, or satisfy the cravings of an empty stomach. It did not put any flour or sugar or bacon in the larder, but it did serve to make us think of our happy, care-free college days, when all the world was bright and rosy and there was nothing to indicate the possibility of Democratic success. [Applause on the Republican side.] Great, indeed, is psychology, and Woodrow Wilson is its prophet!

You have not forgotten the promise that was held out to us by our Democratic friends when the Underwood tariff law went into effect. You remember they told us at that time that on the 1st of January there would be a general resumption of activity in all of our industries. Well, we waited until January, but there was no resumption. Then we were told that if we would wait until the 1st of March every wheel and every spindle in every mill and factory throughout the country would begin to turn. We waited until March, but the wheels and spindles refused to turn. Then they said that if we would wait until the 1st of May, when the flowers begin to bloom, tra la la la [laughter], the very sun in the heavens would be obscured by the clouds of smoke arising from every chimney in this broad land of ours.

Well, we waited until May and the flowers bloomed, but there was no smoke. Then we were told if we would be patient until the 1st day of July we would be overtaken by the greatest prosperity in all our history. Well, we waited until July, and instead of being overtaken by prosperity you will recall that we were overtaken by a drought; and then our Democratic friends quit prophesying an early return of prosperity and they began to pray for rain; but inasmuch as the prayers of the righteous only avail their appeal remained unanswered until August, and in August the war broke out in Europe, and then we were told that as soon as peace was declared we would experience the greatest boom in all history. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Well, when that prophecy was made our friends were only concerned about the approaching November elections. They thought that the war in Europe would be of short duration. But as that titanic conflict continues there has been an ever-increasing demand for American products to supply the needs and necessities of the warring nations of Europe. As the result of that demand American business has been given a temporary stimulus.

But every sensible human being knows that trade in war munitions can not form a lasting basis for American prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are exporting to-day to the warring nations in Europe approximately $300,000,000 of products a month, and this tremendous trade in war supplies has given us a fictitious and artificial prosperity that will crumble and fade away on the day that peace is declared. [Applause on the Republican side.] I for one hope that God will speed that day. I do not want to see my country prosper at the expense of the grief-stricken and heartbroken widows and orphans of the Old World. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not welcome a prosperity that is based upon the sorrows and the misfortunes of our kindred across the seas. [Applause on the Republican side.]

To me the very thought of coining money out of the blood and the tears and the sufferings of humanity is abhorrent. My sympathy goes out to the mothers of Europe, and I would to God that it lay in our power to lift from them this burden of sorrow and weight of woe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Ah, my Democratic friends, when you boast of the kind of prosperity that is now with us, above your notes of exultation I can hear the moans and the groans of the wounded and the dying. When you point to the munitions factory and gloat over its unwonted activities, across the waters I can see the bleak white walls of the dreary hospitals of pain, with their never-ending procession of maimed and mutilated men. When you rejoice over the extra tax that you are now collecting from the opulent manufacturer of war munitions, I can see the pinched and pallid face of the soldier boy, and I can hear him murmur the blessed name of "mother" as his young soul wings its flight to God.

Oh, talk not to me of a prosperity that is eating out the very heart of our boasted Christian civilization, a prosperity that makes a mockery of all the nobler sentiments of the race, a prosperity that is based upon human hate, and that bids defiance to the heaven-sent message of old, "Peace on earth, good will toward men." [Applause on the Republican side.] I prefer a normal to an abnormal prosperity. I believe in "ringing out the false" and "ringing in the true." I prefer the kind of prosperity that we enjoyed for 16 years under a Republican protective tariff. I favor the kind of prosperity that is the direct and logical result of wise legislation, discriminating in favor of the American farmer, the American mechanic, and the American manufacturer, as against his Canadian and European competitor. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Underwood tariff law, and in fact no Democratic tariff law that has ever been enacted, has ever made that discrimination.

On the contrary, every Democratic tariff law discriminates in favor of the foreigner and against the American, and the Underwood law is not an exception to the rule. It deliberately invites imports from abroad, thereby reducing production at home. Why, Mr. UNDERWOOD, the author of the bill, declared, when he introduced his measure into this House, that it was the purpose of his bill to invite foreign competition in our industrial life, and Mr. Wilson said that it would shapen the wits of the American manufacturer and enable him to compete with the European manufacturer. But neither Mr. Wilson nor Mr. UNDERWOOD ever told us just how the American manufacturer is going to meet that competition from abroad and at the same time maintain the American standard of wages. Oh, no doubt it sharpened the wits of the American manufacturer, to the point where the edge was taken off entirely, but while the sharpening process was going on it completely dulled the earning capacity of every American wage earner. [Applause on the Republican side.] I represent in this body a great industrial district. In my district is the important manufacturing city of Granite City. In that city there stands to-day, as a monument to the genius and the wisdom of that great Republican constructive statesman, William McKinley [applause], a magnificent tin-plate plant which, under the beneficent policy of protection, gave employment to thousands of men. The Underwood tariff law had been in operation exactly three days when the Standard Oil Co. placed an order for $1,500,000 worth of tin plate in Wales. They found that because of the reduction made in the tariff on tin plate by the Underwood bill, the rate having been cut from 45 per cent to 15 per cent, they could buy their tin plate in Wales, bring it across the ocean, pay the freight, and manufacture it into cans and make money by the operation. When that order went across the water it took employment away from the tin-plate workers of Granite City. It took employment away from the miners who dig the coal that fires the furnaces. It took employment away from the railroad men who transport the coal to the mills and the finished plate to the market.

It took customers away from the farmer who has produce to sell, from the grocer, the druggist, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker. Does any Democrat believe for a moment that these wage earners can see any virtue in a Democratic tariff law? They are prosperous now; yes. They are prosperous in spite of adverse Democratic tariff legislation. [Applause.] They are prosperous because to-day 30,000,000 men, strong-armed and clean-limbed, in the very prime of vigorous manhood, have left the mills and the factories of Europe for the forts and the trenches. They are prosperous to-day because the mills and factories over there are no longer producing the things that they once produced, but, in the main, they have been transformed into plants for the manufacture of war supplies. They are prosperous to-day because for the time being all industrial competition from Europe has been removed; but they know, and you and I know, that as soon as peace is declared this competition will return, stronger, more vigorous, and more relentless than ever before. [Applause.] The most serious question to engage the attention of the statesmen of the Old World when peace is declared will be the question of rehabilitating their destroyed industries. In order to bring about that rehabilitation they will have to get a supply of money. In order to get money they will have to sell their manufactured products to some country that has the money to pay for them. The United States has the money, and, operating as we now are, under a low tariff, this country will be made the dumping ground for all of Europe; and when these importations begin to flow in upon us every industry in this country will be crippled, and some of them will be completely destroyed. When that time comes there will be a universal demand from Maine to California for a protective tariff that will protect us against ruinous and disastrous competition. [Applause on the Republican side.] And then our Democratic friends will vie with each other in disavowing any responsibility for the iniquitous Underwood tariff law. My friends, I believe with all my heart and soul that a protective tariff is absolutely essential to our national welfare. I believe that the great basic principle underlying that policy—the equalization of the cost of production here and abroad—is fundamentally sound and correct as an economic proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Every sensible man, no matter what his politics may be, will admit that the wage rate in this country is from two to five times as high as it is in the countries of Europe and from ten to twenty-five times as high as it is in the countries of the Orient. If the cost of the labor required to produce a given article in this country is $2, and the cost of the labor required to produce a similar article in Europe is only $1, it stands to reason that unless this Government steps forward and says to the foreign manufacturer, "Before you can sell your product on this side of the Atlantic, before you can dispose of your article in the United States, you must pay first into our Treasury a tariff equal in amount to the difference in cost of producing that article in your country and in our country." Unless that is done, the European article will crowd the American article out of the market, and the American manufacturer will be compelled either to close his factory or to reduce the wages of his employees to the European level in order to meet that competition. He has no other alternative.

My friends, the protective policy of the Republican Party needs no defense. It has stood the test of experience. It has brought untold blessings to every American home, and it finds its vindication to-day in the genuine prosperity that it brought to all the people in days now gone, but which will return when the Republican Party is restored to power on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1917. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Our Democratic friends made another direct and specific promise in the campaign of four years ago, a promise that they would like to have us forget, but which, like Banquo's ghost, will not down. They said in that campaign that the protective system of the Republican Party was responsible for the high cost of living. They wept crocodile tears as they expressed hypocritical sympathy for the downtrodden workingmen. They said that they would reduce the tariff and thereby bring about a corresponding reduction in the cost of the necessities of life. Well, they reduced the tariff, but just to what extent did they reduce the cost of living? They forced the farmer's wheat and corn into competition with Canada and the Argentine Republic, and they compelled him in 1914, before the war created the abnormal demand for our food supplies, to accept the lowest price for his products that he had received since the days of Grover Cleveland.

And yet the price of flour and breakfast cereals continued to advance. They put cattle on the free list and reduced the tariff on woolens and cottons, and yet the price of beef and clothing is higher to-day than at any time in our history.

They put sugar on the free list and almost destroyed the industry from the scare they gave the manufacturers, and then, under the guise of a revenue necessity, they restored the duty in part, and yet the price of sugar to the consumer continued to advance until now only a multimillionaire feels justified in sweetening his breakfast coffee or tea. No wonder that the Democratic Congressman who recalls that promise of four years ago shudders every time his eye rests on the market quotations of the produce exchange. No wonder that he has a congestive chill every time he sees a constituent in the act of buying a dress or fitting on a pair of shoes. No wonder that he has formed the habit of patronizing the back alleys and side streets of his home city whenever he hears that a bridal couple is at the store buying furniture for their little cottage. [Laughter.] But I would bid the consumer to be of good cheer and not to be discouraged. You know you have the comforting assurance from Mr. Wilson that you are now living under the "new freedom"; you are free to buy wherever you can buy the dearest, and to pay for what you buy, if you have the price. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Four years ago our Democratic friends made another direct and specific promise to the people. They said that they would practice the most rigid economy in the management of all governmental affairs. They denounced the Republican Party as the party of profligacy and extravagance. They said that they would apply the pruning knife to all appropriations and give the world an exhibition of what was meant by real old-fashioned Democratic economy. And yet, in the face of that promise, in the very teeth of that declaration, we find that the Sixty-third Congress, the first Democratic Congress under Mr. Wilson, spent $177,000,000 more than was spent by the first Republican Congress under Mr. Taft. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And God only knows the extent of the expenditures of the present Congress. When the figures are finally compiled and given to the world there will not be a Democrat in the United States who will admit that there is such a word as "economy" in the English language.

Appropriations have been simply running riot. Thousands upon thousands of new and needless positions have been created; the civil-service laws and regulations have been set aside; boards and commissions have multiplied with such amazing rapidity that it is only by the exercise of the most extraordinary care that a taxpayer can avoid a collision with a Democratic officeholder when he is taking a stroll on any highway or byway. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Having secured an accidental and temporary lease of power, our Democratic friends seem to have adopted as their rule of action the old motto, "Eat, drink, and be merry, for on the 4th day of next March we die, and we will be a long time dead." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In the campaign of 1912 the Democratic Party proclaimed itself as the champion of genuine nationalism. They promised that they would take a broad and comprehensive view of the Nation's needs; that they would not destroy a single legitimate industry; that they would legislate for all the people, free of favoritism and devoid of discrimination. But in all our history Democratic performance has never squared with Democratic promise. The Democratic Party is not now and has never been a national party in the true meaning of that word. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is distinctly and essentially sectional in character. Its political vision has never extended north of the old Mason and Dixon line. It is controlled in its principles and purposes by the men of the South, many of whom still cling to the traditions of a dead and buried past. Every important committee in the House and Senate, with one or two exceptions, is to-day in the control of men representing southern constituencies. The chairman of a committee, if made of the right kind of material, is always able to shape the legislation that is recommended to Congress by the committee over which he presides.

I have nothing whatever to say against these gentlemen of the South, because I am proud to be able to say that among them I number some of my warmest personal friends. Individually they are agreeable, affable, and courteous gentlemen, but collectively, as a political aggregation, they are an abomination in the sight of the Lord. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Having control of all the committees the South to-day exercises a dominating influence in national legislation wholly out of all proportion to its importance as a contributing factor to the general welfare, either in an agricultural, commercial, or economic sense.

My friends, mortal man is so constituted that he is seldom able to rise above his environment. These Southern gentlemen, in the main, represent districts that are purely agricultural in character and that produce a single crop, and that crop is cotton. The good Lord gave the South a climate and a soil that enables it to produce cotton in competition with all the world. Supplementing these superb natural conditions, the South has an abundance of cheap negro labor with which to harvest its cotton crop. These negro laborers receive 50, 75 cents and $1 a day, and, as a rule, they are kept in debt by being compelled to buy all of their supplies of the plantation or company store, a system of brutal and barbarous servitude that has long since been abolished by law in every Northern State.

The South is not engaged in manufacturing to any considerable extent, and, as a result, the men who represent that section of our country in Congress have absolutely no conception of the industrial needs and necessities of the great manufacturing centers of the North. Having but few white and no negro labor organizations, they have no knowledge of the wage scale that the northern manufacturer pays, and they are not interested in legislation that tends to benefit and improve the condition of the wage earner. They are interested only in securing a market for their cotton, and they are quite willing to buy their plantation machinery and supplies wherever they can be bought the cheapest. It is a matter of indifference to them if those supplies are manufactured in Europe or in the Orient. They are not in the least concerned about the welfare of the employee in the northern mill or factory. It is wholly immaterial to them whether the economic policies which they have placed on the statute books spell ruin and desolation to the laborers of the North so long as they can rest secure in voluntary sectional isolation.

The Republican Party, and the Republican Party alone, has always been the one true and genuine national party. It has always stood for a policy big enough and broad enough and grand enough to protect every legitimate industry in the land, no matter whether that industry is located in the North, in the South, in the East, or in the West. It stands for that policy to-day, and will so continue to stand until time shall be no more.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODENBERG. No; I do not care to yield. My friends, I intend now to leave the discussion of subjects that I know are unpleasant to my Democratic friends, and to pass on to the discussion of a subject which must be positively painful to every red-blooded American. I turn from Democracy's dismal and destructive domestic policies to the consideration of the miserable makeshift, the tragic and truculent travesty which, under President Wilson, masquerades as America's foreign policy. First, I shall consider poor, bleeding, distracted Mexico. From the day that Maximilian was dethroned as Emperor by Benito Juarez and Porfirio Diaz, the controlling factor in Mexican politics has always been the moral influence of the Government of the United States. But for the vigorous and determined action of Secretary Seward at the close of the Civil War the revolt against Maximilian would not have succeeded, and Diaz would not have become President. For 34 years Diaz enjoyed our good will and friendship, and during that time he was able to maintain peace within the borders of his country, but when it became known that the Diaz government had entered into a secret agreement with Japan under the terms of which the Japanese were to be given a naval base on the west coast of Mexico, he forfeited our friendship and good will, and paved the way for the success of the revolution under Francisco Madero. When Madero became President it was not long until he, too, lost our friendship because of his refusal to pay any attention to the demands of the American ambassador, Mr. Henry Lane Wilson, for the payment of indemnity for the loss of American life and property during his revolution.

When Madero was forced out, Huerta became President, and when President Wilson announced his determination not to accord official recognition to Huerta, his doom was sealed then and there. The history of the last 50 years teaches us that stable government in Mexico is absolutely impossible without the moral support and sympathetic cooperation of the Government of the United States. In the early days of this Republic we promulgated the Monroe doctrine, and we have insisted ever since upon its recognition as a vital principle of American policy, if not of international law. For 90 years we have maintained a protectorate over all Latin America, and we have said to all the world that we would not permit any European monarchy to gain a foothold on the Western Continent. When we voluntarily assumed that position we, by implication at least, guaranteed the ability and the capacity of the Latin American peoples for self-government. Having deliberately assumed that position, what, then, is the plain duty of the United States in the event that any of the Latin American Governments now under our protectorate should collapse? Power always carries with it responsibility. If we intend in the future to insist upon the recognition of the Monroe doctrine as a principle of international law, it follows that we must be prepared to meet fairly and squarely all of the responsibilities incident thereto, or we must forever abandon that doctrine. There is no other alternative. What are the conditions to-day in Mexico? The experiment of democratic government in that country has failed. The whole social fabric has collapsed. Organized society has broken down. A reign of terror exists. Law and order have been set aside. Anarchy is triumphant. There is no security; no protection; no government. All is chaos and confusion. Mexico is no longer able to enforce her treaty obligations or to give protection either to her own citizens or to foreigners who may be domiciled there.

What part has our country played in this dreary drama of destruction, and who, I ask, is primarily responsible for the carnival of crime that is now at its height in Mexico? I make the statement, and I measure my words in doing so, that the impartial historian of the future will lay the responsibility at the feet of Woodrow Wilson and his wobbling policy of "watchful waiting." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Victoriano Huerta was President of Mexico when Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated President of the United States. The de facto government of Huerta had been recognized by all the leading countries of Europe, but President Wilson, although besought and importuned to do so by practically every substantial and intelligent resident of Mexico, both foreign and native, declined to accord official recognition to Huerta, the only man of sufficient force of character to restore law and order in the distracted Republic, and allowed himself to be controlled in his action as President by the sentimental idealism of the late departed, but not lamented, Mr. Bryan. In announcing his refusal to recognize the de facto government of Huerta, Mr. Wilson proclaimed his intention of not interfering in the affairs of Mexico and of not permitting anyone else to interfere. The very act of refusing recognition to Huerta was in itself an interference in the domestic affairs of our neighboring Republic and a deliberate attempt on Mr. Wilson's part to destroy the only government that Mexico had. But Mr. Wilson did not stop there. He even had the temerity to inform the people of Mexico that they might hold an election, but if Huerta were the choice of the electorate he would not be recognized by the United States. From that day to this he has followed such a policy of officious and irritating meddling, tinctured with indecision and vacillation, that to-day all Latin America believes that the diplomacy of the United States is based on duplicity and double dealing.

When we sent that great and experienced diplomat (?) and "deserving Democrat," John Lind, to Mexico to try moral suasion in an effort to dislodge Huerta, and which was later followed by an offer of financial aid to the Mexican Government if Huerta would only do the disappearing act, he gave Gamboa, the Mexican minister of foreign affairs, an opportunity to create a laugh at our expense, the echoes of which are still ringing in our ears.

Not a scintilla of evidence that would be admitted in any American court of record has as yet been produced connecting Huerta with the assassination of Madero. No official statement has ever been issued by this Government or by the Government of Carranza implicating Huerta as an accessory before or after the act. All has been mere hearsay. There is nothing upon which to base a charge against Huerta but innuendo and veiled insinuation. I believe now, and have always believed, that every consideration of common sense, every consideration of ordinary justice and fair dealing, required the President to follow the example of the leading countries of Europe in according recognition to Huerta. [Applause.] But, of course, a diplomacy which finds its inspiration in grape juice can not be expected to scintillate any very great amount of common sense. [Laughter.]

But if Mr. Wilson felt that he could not recognize Huerta without doing violence to his supersensitive conscience, then, why in heaven's name did not he accord recognition at once to the Carranza Government, and by that act give notice to Mexico and the world that the United States was determined to establish a government down there and put an end to brigandage and murder and rapine? Why did he wait until October 19, 1915—two years and seven months after he assumed the Presidency—before recognizing Carranza? If he felt that he had sufficient knowledge of Mexican conditions to warrant him in deposing Huerta, then we have a right to assume that he should have been ready to take the next step necessary to reestablish orderly government in Mexico.

Even Mr. Wilson or any other idealist must know that any country without a government quickly lapses into a state of anarchy and especially so when 80 per cent of the people of that country are illiterate and semibarbarous. If Mr. Wilson really felt the deep sympathy that he has always professed to feel for the starving Mexican people then, after deliberately destroying the only government that existed in Mexico, I insist that every dictate of humanity, every impulse of justice, demanded that he do all in his power to establish forthwith and without delay a government capable of enforcing the fundamental guaranties of a civilized government, the protection of life, liberty, and property. The adoption of any other policy under the circumstances is stamped not only with indecision but with insincerity as well. [Applause on Republican side.]

The administration's entire course with regard to Mexico has been a succession of stupid and brutal blunders. There is not a single creditable incident in the whole miserable affair. Huerta was proclaimed President on February 19, 1913, or 13 days before the inauguration of Mr. Wilson, and despite the frantic efforts of our bewildered and befuddled administration he was not forced out of the Presidency until July 15, 1914. The attempt to force that resignation could well be utilized by a humorist as a plot in comic opera but for the humiliating effect on our national pride. You will recall that on April 9, 1914, several of our soldiers were arrested at Tampico by some petty Mexican officer, and that after their release Rear Admiral Mayo demand an apology and punishment of the officers making the arrest and a public salute of 21 guns to our flag within 24 hours.

The apology was promptly made and punishment was meted out to the offending officers, but the salute was not fired. Thereupon President Wilson, through O'Shaunessy, demanded an immediate compliance with Mayo's request that a salute be fired by a government which he refused to recognize and which he himself said did not exist. [Applause on the Republican side.] Huerta replied that powder in Mexico was rather expensive, but that he would fire a salute if Mayo would fire one in return. Then our marines and sailors were ordered down to Vera Cruz and they took possession of the customhouse, and in doing so 17 of our boys were killed. Then Funston and the Fifth Brigade were sent down, and they remained in Vera Cruz until November 23, when they were suddenly withdrawn upon the threatening and imperative demand of Carranza. This whole senseless and ridiculous performance cost the United States the lives of 17 of our brave boys and $10,000,000 in money, but the salute has never been fired. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When Huerta was finally overthrown and Carranza entered Mexico City the President again hesitated and shrank from a plain responsibility. It was apparent to everybody that Villa was on the point of revolting against Carranza, and if President Wilson had met the situation by promptly recognizing Carranza and had given Villa and his followers to understand that no revolt on their part would be tolerated by our Government, I feel morally certain that many of the succeeding bloody chapters of Mexico's history would never have been written. The recognition did not come and Villa revolted, and the President then showed his deep sympathy for the Mexican people by permitting the State Department, under Mr. Bryan, to covertly aid and abet Villa, the most villainous and bloodthirsty bandit of them all.

Finally conditions became so unbearable that the administration reluctantly concluded that some action was necessary. Accordingly the so-called A. B. C. powers, Argentine, Brazil, and Chile, were asked to call representatives of the warring factions of Mexico into a conference for the purpose of composing their differences and forming a government. In this call it was clearly and unmistakably intimated by our Government that failure on the part of any Mexican faction to respond to the call and participate in the conference would result in a refusal by us to deal with such faction in the future. Villa, Zapata, and other bandit chiefs accepted the invitation with alacrity and enthusiasm, and the world then witnessed the humiliating and disgraceful spectacle of the great and powerful Government of the United States counseling and conferring with murderers and cutthroats as to our future policy in Mexico. Even Carranza, steeped in treachery as he since has shown himself to be, seems to have had too much self-respect left to take part in a conference with Villa and Zapata. He peremptorily refused to attend, but within six weeks thereafter he was recognized by Woodrow Wilson as the de facto head of the Government of Mexico. Great God, what a record of infamy and shame! What a travesty on diplomacy and statesmanship! Is it any wonder that the world stands aghast and the people of America hang their heads in deep humiliation whenever they think of Wilson's Mexican policy? [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, it will not avail Mr. Wilson or his apologists to try to make it appear that all Americans residing in Mexico are freebooters and adventurers. Many an honest man of moderate means has gone there on legitimate business and in the hope of winning a competence for himself and family. He was proud of his American citizenship when he went to Mexico. He regarded it as a badge of honor and he felt that he was fully protected by our treaty with that country. But he was soon disillusioned. When trouble came and he appealed to his Government for protection, the administration at Washington bluntly and brutally informed him to leave his earthly possessions behind and to get out of the country, as no protection would be extended to him. The action of the American Government in sending that notice to American residents in Mexico was at the same time notice to the bandits of Mexico that they were at liberty to plunder and rob and kill Americans with impunity and without let or hindrance. Already 250 Americans have been wantonly and brutally murdered, scores of American women have been ravished, little children have been horribly mistreated, the American flag has become an object of contempt and derision in every part of Mexico, and when an appeal for relief is made to Washington the victims of Mexican outrage are met by the insulting query, "What are you doing in Mexico; why don't you get out and come home?"

It took the administration two years and seven months to make up its mind to recognize Carranza, and because of this tardy recognition, because of the many humiliating intervening events, because of the spineless, vacillating policy that has been pursued, because of the universal contempt in Mexico for everything American, even Carranza seems to have lost all respect for us, and there is every indication that it will not be long until we will have serious trouble with the de facto government of which he is the head. If the recital of Mexican outrages as set forth in Secretary Lansing's note to Carranza is based on fact, then that recital constitutes a stronger indictment of the inefficiency and incompetency of the Wilson administration than any partisan Republican could possibly frame. [Applause on the Republican side.] In that note Secretary Lansing specifically charges Carranza adherents with responsibility for the attacks on Brownsville, Red House Ferry, Progreso Post Office, and Las Peladas, all of which occurred during last September. And yet, notwithstanding the treachery of Carranza and his followers the administration, of which Mr. Lansing is the chief official, has complacently permitted Carranza to import arms and munitions from the United States into Mexico. The trouble at Parral occurred as late as April 10 of this year. The attack on our soldiers at that place was made by the soldiers of Carranza. Four days after the attack and after the administration had full knowledge of Carranza's treachery, Secretary Lansing issued an order permitting Carranza to import 1,000,000 rounds of small-arms ammunition. The day before the order was issued Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, vice president of the Phelps-Dodge Co., was in the city of Washington and, according to the newspapers, visited the Secretary of State.

The Phelps-Dodge Co. is engaged in the manufacture and sale of munitions of war and is the same company that was indicted in the Federal courts for violating the embargo on the shipment of munitions to Mexico in the last year of the Taft administration and escaped conviction on the technicality that the munitions had not actually reached the Republic of Mexico but had been stopped at Bisbee, Ariz. Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, vice president of the Phelps-Dodge Co., is a most interesting gentleman. The records show that he was the heaviest individual contributor to the Democratic national campaign fund in 1912, his first contribution being $30,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not making any charge against the integrity of the Secretary of State, nor do I know positively that the Phelps-Dodge Co. sold Carranza this 1,000,000 rounds of ammunition, but I can not help wondering if there is any connection between the call of Mr. Dodge on Mr. Lansing and the issuance of the order. The ammunition which was imported by Carranza under that order was used in the attack on our soldiers at Carrizal, in which 19 of the Nation's defenders, including two officers, lost their lives. If there should be any connection between the visit of Mr. Dodge and the issuance of the order, and if the ammunition that was shipped to Mexico was shipped by the Phelps-Dodge Co., then may God have mercy on an administration that permits a campaign contributor to recoup himself at the expense of the lives of our gallant soldier boys. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

But, say our Democratic friends, President Wilson has kept us out of war, and that is reason enough why he is entitled to reelection. Two years ago they adopted as their slogan: "War in Europe, peace in America, God bless Wilson." Well, I want the good Lord to bless the President of the United States. I want Him to bless every American citizen, the highest and the humblest, the richest and the poorest. But I can conceive of no good or valid reason why a special blessing should be invoked upon the President because we are not at war with Mexico. Why, the very act of sending our troops to Vera Cruz because of an imaginary insult was in itself, under the usages of international law, a casus belli or act of war, and would have been so construed by Huerta but for the fact that he had his hands full trying to suppress the revolution of Villa and Carranza. The people of the United States owe absolutely nothing to Mr. Wilson because we are still at peace with Mexico. His persistent and pernicious meddling in the internal affairs of that unhappy country would long since have provoked an open rupture and actual war but for Mexico's inability to unite her own people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, say our Democratic friends, Wilson has kept us out of the European war. Why of course he has. Why should he not? Who wants war with any of the European powers? What American citizen in the full possession of his senses is demanding that our country should become involved in that terrific conflict? Where is there any sentiment for war anywhere within the confines of this Republic? Is the President entitled to wear a halo of imperishable glory for simply doing that which all of his fellow-Americans not engaged in the sale of munitions want to have done? Is he entitled to any special praise for performing a plain duty? No; no. On the contrary, the President would lay himself open to the severest censure and condemnation if he failed to exhaust every honorable means, every resource of diplomacy, to prevent our country from being drawn into this awful vortex which has engulfed all Europe. The attempt to capitalize in a political way the performance of a solemn duty that a Chief Executive owes to his country will fail, and so, too, will the attempt to create a false and un-American issue of so-called Americanism. [Applause on the Republican side.] The descendants of no one nationality that enters into our composite American life can claim a monopoly of loyalty to the Stars and Stripes. Every civilized nation under God's shining sun has contributed its share to the glory and the greatness and the grandeur of American civilization. [Applause on the Republican side.] These men came from across the seas because of their love for liberty. Here they have established their homes and reared their families and here in free, sun-kissed and heaven-blessed America lie all their future hopes and aspirations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

To-day all Europe is drenched in blood. The flower of the young manhood of the Old World is being sacrificed to the god of war. Already 5,000,000 men, created in the image of their Maker and endowed with immortal souls have paid the last full measure of devotion to their country and their country's cause. And as that gigantic struggle drags its bloody length along, we on this side of the Atlantic are overcome by conflicting emotions. Related as we are by ties of blood and consanguinity to the people of the Old World, it is but natural that our sympathies should be divided. I have nothing but profound pity for any man, no matter what his nationality may be, who does not sympathize with the land of his ancestors' birth in this great struggle for national existence, and I insist that an expression of that sympathy is in no sense a reflection on anyone's Americanism. [Applause on the Republican side.] On the contrary, I regard it as in every way commendable and as an evidence of deep and genuine humanity. God help the man who would attempt to make political capital for himself or his party by stifling the noblest emotions of the human heart. My father and mother were born near where flows the classic Rhine, but I thank God that when my father came to this country at the close of the Revolution of 1848 and took the oath of allegiance to the laws and the Constitution of this Government, that he meant exactly what he said. [Applause.] I thank God that he became an American citizen not only in word but in spirit as well, and that he instilled in the hearts of his children a sincere love of reverence for the Old Flag and for the institutions of his adopted country. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

The sentiments that animated my father animated yours, and when their devotion to American ideals is questioned because of a lingering affection for the land of their nativity we can point with pride to a hundred battle fields upon which many of them sealed their loyalty with their blood. [Applause on the Republican side.] No, no; it will not do. It is un-American; it is un-Christian; it is inhuman. You and I and all of us, and our fathers before us, believe in genuine Americanism. We believe in an Americanism that observes the spirit of true neutrality and that is free of all official partiality. We believe in an Americanism that shows no favoritism and that insists upon the recognition and enforcement of American rights on land or sea by every European belligerent, an Americanism that challenges and compels respect for the American flag by every nation on earth. [Applause on the Republican side.] You may talk in glittering generalities about "intrigues" and "hyphenates," but the inherent spirit of fair play that characterizes every true American will demand that you present a bill of particulars or stand convicted of criminal hypocrisy at the bar of enlightened public opinion. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Time will not permit me to discuss at length the contradictory and chameleonlike record of this administration. Suffice it to say that President Wilson has completely reversed himself on practically every important question. At one time he was in favor of a single presidential term, of free canal tolls, of intervention in Mexico, of theoretical free trade, of Garrison's continental army plan, and of "knocking Bryan into a cocked hat," and now he is opposed to all of them. [Laughter and applause.] At another time he was opposed to military training, to increasing the Army and Navy, to a tariff commission, to labor unions, and to adequate preparedness, and now he is in favor of all of them. But perhaps, after all, there is an explanation.

The President once admitted in a burst of confidence that he had a "single-track mind." You know that at the end of every single-track railroad there is always a turntable, and if presidential peregrinations count for anything it must be apparent to every observer that the President landed on the turntable at the end of the track early in his term and has been traveling in a circle ever since. [Applause and laughter on Republican side.]

These are the counts in our indictment of Woodrow Wilson and his inefficient administration. The issues are joined, the record is made up, and the Republican Party is ready to submit the case to the verdict of the people. With an abiding faith in the intelligence, the manhood, and the patriotism of the American voter, we look forward with hope and confidence to the 4th day of March, 1917, when, under the courageous, capable, and patriotic leadership of Charles Evans Hughes [loud applause on Republican side] our national prestige will be fully restored and the Republic will once again assume her proud position in the sisterhood of nations. [Prolonged applause on Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. HEFLIN rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the other gentlemen who already have orders permitting them to speak to-night, following the gentleman from Alabama, shall have permission to address the House to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, there is no special order for to-morrow, then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the request that the gentlemen who also have permission to speak to-day may speak to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Wood] may have leave to address the House to-morrow for 40 minutes, following the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, ours is the first Government in all the world to have a written Constitution as its organic law, and here for the first time in all history a Supreme Court was established to construe the Constitution. This system is the product of the collective wisdom of our fathers, and it is a great improvement over all other systems. The Constitution of the United States is the chart and compass of American liberty, and the Supreme Court is the chief guardian of its sacred principles. In that body more than in any other branch of the Government is lodged the saving strength of the Republic. It was suggested in the Constitutional Convention that the President and a certain number of the Supreme Court Judges be given a qualified veto power over all measures passed by Congress, but, as Judge Simeon E. Baldwin, of Connecticut, has well said, "That would not do, for it would have thrown the Supreme Court judges into active participation in politics, and that would have impaired popular confidence in the Supreme Court."

Mr. Speaker, the fathers realized the importance and necessity of placing the supreme authority beyond the reach of political influences and partisan ambition, and they established the Supreme Court upon a constitutional elevation above the legislative and executive branches of the Government. In the early days there were those who questioned the wisdom of allowing the Supreme Court to have and exercise a power that could declare null and void the acts of the legislative and executive branches of the Government, but the wise and far-seeing patriots of that day said that the legislative and executive branches of the Government are political in their nature and are susceptible to political influences and dependent upon political success at the polls. But they said the Supreme Court, with its members consecrated to the work and serving for life, free from party strife and bitterness, purely judicial and nonpartisan in its character, will exercise its power without the fear of political punishment or the hope of political reward. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, in order to make sure that those chosen for service in the court of last resort would never seek or accept political office or have occasion to worry about provision for old age, our fathers provided for the life tenure of its members, with permission to retire at the age of 70 years, continuing to draw the salary until death. They made no such provision for Members of Congress, and they did not thus provide for even the President of the United States.

What more could our fathers have done to show that they deemed it wise and necessary to keep the Supreme Court entirely out of politics, and that they regarded it as a sacred institution, especially set apart and dedicated to the highest and most important service in our Government?

It is clear, then, that the fathers intended that the Supreme Court should be and forever remain out of politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

WASHINGTON'S OPINION.

When President Washington appointed for life the first judges of the Supreme Court, men of judicial skill and rectitude, the personal representatives of the dignity and majesty of the law, he declared that the Supreme Court is the chief pillar upon which our National Government must rest. The Father of our Country helped to create this independent and nonpartisan tribunal of the Nation. He saw that it was good, pronounced his blessing upon it, christened it in the name of liberty, and dedicated it to the cause of justice. [Applause.] He then committed it to the care and keeping of the generations that were to come after him; and they, thank God, have protected and preserved it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.

Mr. Speaker, the great Chief Justice Marshall, who believed in the life tenure of the Supreme Court judges, and who frequently praised the plan which kept the Supreme Court out of politics, declared that the judge must be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to influence or control him but God and his conscience. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Hon. Charles E. Shepherd, a distinguished lawyer from the State of Washington, speaking on Marshall day, 1901, of the nonpartisan character of our Supreme Court, said that Chief Justice Marshall was unmoved by the rise and fall of parties and administrations. The vision of a coming election never passed athwart that clear, penetrating, judicial eye. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, Judge Baldwin has said that—

The Supreme Court was the rock against which the wave of political reaction which swept John Adams into retirement and made Jefferson President dashed in vain.

CHARLES CARROLL, OF CARROLLTON.

Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, whose honored name graces the Declaration of Independence, said in 1827:

I consider the Supreme Court of the United States as the strongest guardian of the powers of Congress and the rights of the people.

In 1835 Hon. Horace Binney, of Philadelphia, one of the greatest lawyers that ever lived, in speaking of Chief Justice Marshall and the Supreme Court, said:

The Supreme Court judge in administering the law is the representative of the abstract justice of the people.

And in 1884 Chief Justice Waite, in unveiling the monument erected here in honor of Chief Justice Marshall, said:

The judicial power of the United States has been carefully preserved and wisely administered.

CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER.

In 1901, 100 years from the time that John Marshall was made Chief Justice, Chief Justice Fuller, of this same nonpartisan tribunal, declared that—

The Supreme Court judge must walk the straight and narrow path marked out by law regardless of political expediency or party politics.

Speaking in honor of Chief Justice Marshall in 1901, Senator William Lindsay, an able statesman of Kentucky, said:

No other court compares with our Supreme Court in jurisdiction, power, or independence. The peace, the prosperity, and the very existence of the Union are vested in the hands of our Supreme Court judges. It is, indeed, fortunate that we have a tribunal commanding public respect and public confidence, the mandates of which the people accept without regard to political affiliations or preconceived opinions.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, patriots East and West, North and South, Democrats and Republicans alike, bear testimony to the potential power and beneficent influence of our independent and nonpartisan Supreme Court. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What a source of strength it has been to the Republic in all the years that are gone!

FREE FROM IMPROPER INFLUENCE.

Hon. George M. Williams, an able lawyer of Oregon, said on Marshall day in 1901:

The Supreme Court of the United States is as far removed from the influence of passion and prejudice as it is possible for a human tribunal to be.

And this fact, Mr. Speaker, more than any other, has made that court revered and respected by all classes and conditions of our people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Again, Judge Simeon E. Baldwin says:

In England the British ministry is directly represented in the court of last resort before which causes of international importance may be brought; but here the situation is different. The Supreme Court does not act upon notions of State policy. It is a body purely judicial, and its office is purely to declare the law.

And, continuing, he says:

In no other government, as in ours, is the foreign office so powerless to control judicial proceedings by which foreign relations are affected.

So, Mr. Speaker, this situation accounts for the fact that no high court in all the world enjoys the reputation abroad that this court does among the nations of the earth. [Applause.] A few years ago a dispute arose between Canada and the United States, and Canada suggested that she was willing for the Supreme Court of the United States to determine the question. Mr. Speaker, what a beautiful acknowledgment of our Supreme Court's reputation for fairness and impartiality; what a splendid tribute to the integrity of this purely judicial and nonpartisan court of ours. [Applause.] Judge U. M. Rose, of Little Rock, a brilliant lawyer of Arkansas [applause], on Marshall day in 1901, in his splendid tribute to the nonpartisan character of our Supreme Court, said:

With us the Government is one of limited powers, and the humblest citizen may at any time challenge the authority of Congress or President or both combined. The Supreme Court, composed of learned men, quite excluded from the pale of actual or practical politics, having control of neither the sword nor the purse, presents to the world the fairest and best judicial tribunal ever devised by the wisdom of man.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

SUPREME COURT CONTROLLING INFLUENCE.

Hon. Frank Springer, of the Territory of New Mexico, said, in 1901:

If this Republic endures longer than those of antiquity, it will be chiefly by reason of the controlling influence of that great court which maintains the equilibrium of the Nation—which holds together the Union like some great sun of a planetary system, sending its light to the remotest parts, allowing each member to move unrestrained in its appointed path, but binding all by its mighty force, so that they can neither collide with each other nor depart from the system.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, where is the patriot who is willing to tamper with the power which maintains the equilibrium of the Nation? Where is the citizen who is willing to destroy the light of our civic sun, which by its majesty and power holds in place and blesses every righteous force in the Government? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Hon. George R. Peck, in his article on the March of the Constitution, speaking of how the Supreme Court has guarded that sacred instrument, says:

It has been so administered as to combine more of liberty to the citizen with more of power in the Nation than any other constitutional government.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, we are called upon to break a custom that has greatly blessed and benefited the American people. We are urged to establish a precedent that would radically change the status of our Supreme Court and plunge it into partisan politics. [Applause.]

PARTISAN INFLUENCE.

If our fathers in the early days were so careful to guard the Supreme Court against partisan influence and political ambition, with what scrupulous care should we guard it now, when sinister interests appeal more to the power of the purse than to the principle of the patriot. [Applause.] When they seek to coerce the voter, make barter of the ballot, and undertake to buy the highest office within the gift of the people. [Applause.] Sinister interests with political influence in too many instances have been able to work their will in local courts at the expense of justice and to the detriment and great injury of the citizen involved. Now, if any citizen, however humble and obscure, feels that the Constitution has been violated and political influence and partisan prejudice have operated to deny him justice, he can go to this nonpartisan tribunal, beyond the reach and taint of partisan consideration, and there receive justice. [Applause.]

THE PEOPLE'S STRONGHOLD.

Mr. Speaker, that court is the rich man's rock against improper judgments, the poor man's shelter against judicial tyranny, the city of refuge for both capital and labor, and the people's mighty stronghold of justice against injustice. [Applause.] The feeling of respect and appreciation on the part of the people for our Supreme Court and their abiding faith in its integrity and in its love of justice have done more to inspire patriotism and strengthen the Republic than any other influence in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker I have heard of a State in this Union where it is said that one of the supreme court judges was ambitious to be governor. One day a case of considerable importance came up for consideration. The parties on one side of the suit were men of great political influence, and it is said that this judge expressed friendship for their side, took charge of the case, wrote the opinion, and later announced his candidacy for the office of governor. Mr. Speaker, if this precedent, which drags the Supreme Court into politics, is established, and we say to our Supreme Court judges, hereafter you are at liberty to court political influence and seek political office, I fear that some time some judge may play politics at the expense of justice, and sacrifice human rights upon the altar of political ambition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

LORD JEFFREYS.

Lord Jeffreys, of infamous memory, chief justice of the High Court of England, dragged the judicial ermine into the mire of corrupt politics and used his office to influence elections. On one occasion he went to a city where an election was being held and entered the court room where Mayor Peckham was holding court. On seeing him there, the mayor became indignant and rebuked him, saying:

You, who ought to be the guardian of our laws and sacred constitution, shall not thus audaciously violate them.

[Applause.]

Our fathers saw what political ambition and partisan activity did for the High Court of England, and they resolved to avoid the mistakes of the mother country. Those who framed the Constitution were determined to place safeguards around our Supreme Court so as to keep it forever out of politics, and I repeat they wisely provided that its members should serve for life [applause], and retire, if they desired to do so, at the age of 70 years, continuing to draw the salary until death.

FROM WASHINGTON TO WILSON.

From Washington to Jackson and from Jackson to Lincoln, from Lincoln to Cleveland and from Cleveland to McKinley, and from McKinley to Wilson the people of all parties have protected the Supreme Court against political invasion, and millions yet unborn will guard and protect it in the years that are to come. [Applause.]

JUSTICE HUGHES.

In 1912 Mr. Justice Hughes said:

A Supreme Court judge should not be available for political office. The Supreme Court must not be dragged into politics.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker? "Because above the need of any man's service in political office in this country rises the importance of the unstained integrity and nonpartisan character of our Supreme Court." [Applause.]

That was the position of Mr. Justice Hughes in 1912. Then he regarded the keeping of the Supreme Court out of politics as a matter of grave concern to the country. Then he felt that his country's best interest demanded that he refuse to allow the use of his name—a Supreme Court judge—as a candidate for the office of President in order to relieve his party of an embarrassing situation. Mr. Speaker, in the light of his position in 1912 and in view of what he has done in 1916, I ask what it is that causes him to be willing now to drag down and sacrifice this nonpartisan court upon the altar of partisan expediency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] With what degree of grace and good conscience can he invite the voter now to do that which he declared four years ago was a dangerous step to be taken in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has told us in strong language how important it is to keep the Supreme Court out of politics. What reason will he offer now for his effort to change it from an independent, nonpartisan court to a recruiting station of candidates for President? [Applause on the Democratic side.] What argument has he to make now as to why it should be changed from a temple of justice to a political hotbed of partisan ambition? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, Hon. WARREN G. HARDING, a Republican United States Senator from Ohio, was permanent chairman of a convention dominated by Republican bosses at Chicago. In notifying ex-Supreme Court Justice Hughes of a nomination that he had received by that convention Senator HARDING reminded him that his nomination "was extraordinary and without a parallel in the history of the Republican Party." That is true, Mr. Speaker. It was indeed a most extraordinary nomination. It did not only violate a long-standing precedent and tradition of the Republican Party, but it struck a dangerous blow at civil liberty in America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That boss-ridden and degenerate old party of PENESE and SMOOR having stifled virtue and destroyed moral vigor in itself, now turned in its greed and desperation and laid its cruel hands upon the Supreme Court, the very citadel of human rights in America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, Mr. Speaker, upon that unprecedented performance and that most extraordinary nomination they invite patriotic Progressives not only to repudiate the principles that they stood for four years ago, when they fought bossism, ring rule, and corruption, but they invite them to use their ballots in support of a movement which will, if successful, work injury to their children and their children's children long after we are dead. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

TEMPLE OF JUSTICE.

Mr. Speaker, for more than a hundred years the American people have regarded our Supreme Court as a temple of justice far above the plane of partisan politics, and never until now has any political party desired or dared to invade its sacred precincts in search of a candidate for President [applause on the Democratic side]; but with due appreciation of the wisdom and necessity of keeping that court out of politics and placing their country's welfare above the desire for party success, all parties have guarded against breaking the custom which has kept our Supreme Court free from political influence and partisan ambitions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, Mr. Speaker, it remained for the power-hungry bosses of the Republican Party to invade that holy of holies in our judicial system and undertake to establish a precedent that would destroy the independence and nonpartisan character of our Supreme Court. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes, Mr. Speaker, in order to get control of the Government these desperate bosses of the Republican Party are willing to weaken public confidence in this court of last resort and destroy its usefulness as the chief guardian of constitutional rights and liberties. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The bosses of the Republican Party who invaded our temple of justice and undertook to violate its sanctity and rob it of its nonpartisan character by dragging it into politics are not the friends but they are the enemies of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

DESPERATE BOSSES.

We are told that when Napoleon made known to Josephine his intention to divorce her, she pointed to a star in the sky and said to him: "That is your star, bright and resplendent now, but the day that you divorce me your star is set." I want to say to the reckless bosses of the Republican Party who have gone to the Supreme Court for a candidate for President, you are taking a step fraught with grave danger to the country. You are seeking to violate a principle dear to the American people, and you are striving to break a custom as old as the Government, and if your un-American plan succeeds you will have dimmed the luster and destroyed the brilliancy of the brightest star in the firmament of American liberty. [Applause on Democratic side.]

SINISTER INTERESTS.

Mr. Speaker, if this plan of the Republican bosses succeeds, and ex-Supreme Court Justice Hughes is elected President, the Supreme Court will be in politics, and then sinister interests will have succeeded in storming the once impregnable citadel of the Nation's strength and in striking down the mightiest bulwark of American liberty. [Applause on Democratic side.] They will then be able to do what they were powerless to accomplish before the Supreme Court was invaded by boss politicians and its members imbued with the desire for political office and fired with the spirit of partisan ambition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then it will not be long until we will be confronted with the awful spectacle of Supreme Court judges either openly or secretly striving to secure the Democratic and Republican nominations for the office of President. Mr. Speaker, upon our ability to defeat the establishment of this wicked precedent which would drag our Supreme Court into politics depends the preservation of rights and liberties dear to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The wise custom which has kept our Supreme Court out of politics, purely judicial and nonpartisan in character, was in existence when every citizen now living was born, and the blessed right to keep it inviolate is the birthright of the American citizen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Who, then, is ready to barter this birthright for a mess of political potage? Where is the father who will deliberately follow a course that he knows will bring evil to his children and injury to his country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, we must not weaken and impair this great judicial institution whose nonpartisan character has become a part of the vital life of the Nation, but we owe it to ourselves and to our children to contribute to its strength and preservation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Our fathers established this wise and valuable custom, and it is our duty to protect and preserve it.

SENATOR LODGE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Senator LODGE of Massachusetts, a Republican, took the position in 1901 that—

When a judge ascends to the Supreme Court bench the door of political preferment closes behind him.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

So, Mr. Speaker, if a Supreme Court judge puts off the judicial ermine, turns his back upon the Constitution, and quits the temple of justice to engage in partisan warfare, we must see to it that the precedent is not established, for in this way alone can we prevent this public calamity and this crime against the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Grover Cleveland, in his article on "Good citizenship," said:

The abandonment of our country's watchtowers by those who should be on guard and the slumber of the sentinels who should never sleep directly invite the stealthy approach, the pillage, and the loot of selfishness and greed.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the Republic itself could speak, animated by the patriotic spirits of Washington, Madison, Marshall, and Lincoln, it would say to the Republican bosses who have violated confidence and abused power in the legislative and executive branches of the Government:

Spare the Supreme Court,
Place no stain upon its brow,
For a hundred years it has guided me,
And you shall not harm it now.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, of the long list of distinguished jurists who have ministered in the temple of justice only two or three have tried to drag it into politics and pervert it from the ends of its institution, but be it said to the everlasting praise of the patriots of the country, they refused to sanction this attempted violation of a time-honored custom. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people of the United States are devoted to the principles and established in the faith that this court must and shall be forever free from partisan politics and political ambition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE NATION'S HIGHEST COURT.

Mr. Speaker, our Supreme Court is the loftiest tribunal in all the world [applause], and a place on that bench is the climax and crowning glory of attainment in the legal profession. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When an American citizen is elevated to that high station and crosses its sacred threshold and puts on the honored ermine of the Nation's highest court, he ought to dedicate his talents and consecrate his all to whole-hearted service in the temple of justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let it be known in all the hereafter that there is one high and sacred place in our system of Government that shall never be invaded by political influence and partisan ambition, and that everyone who enters that sacred tribunal closes the door of political ambition behind him, casts anchor with the Constitution to live and die as one of its faithful guardians. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE POWER OF LIFE AND DEATH.

Mr. Speaker, our Supreme Court holds the scales of justice between the man of moderate means and the man of large fortune. It determines cases in which the welfare of society is involved and the life of the citizen is at stake. It has the power to revise and destroy all other court decisions. It wields the power of life and death over State and Federal statute, and it has the power to declare null and void the acts of the Chief Executive of the Nation, and I submit to this House and to the country that this great court, on account of its supreme power and importance, should forever remain free from partisan ambition and political activity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This court must never be perverted from the ends of its institution. It must forever remain true to the purpose of its creation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The power to make law is important and the power to execute law is essential, but the power to destroy law, the power to withhold or to administer justice, is the most important power of all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE ARK OF THE COVENANT.

Here, then, in the Supreme Court, our fathers lodged the ark of our civic covenant, and they wisely provided that those chosen to guard and protect it should enlist for life and be consecrated to the service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That ark was placed there by the founders of the Republic, and for more than a hundred years it has remained in the temple of justice high above the din and noise of partisan contests. There, in its exalted grandeur, it guards the Constitution, holds the scales of justice and contributes as no other power can to the strength and perpetuity of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the man who votes to break this custom, to change the status of our Supreme Court from a nonpartisan to a political body, votes against his own best interest and against the best interest of his children and his children's children. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the name of the sainted dead whose sacred hands separated that court from politics and dedicated it to the cause of justice, I call upon every patriot guard in the country to vote to retain this valuable custom. In the name of millions yet unborn, whose rights and liberties will be injuriously affected if this court is to be dragged into politics, I summon every sentinel in the Republic to protest and preserve this mighty bulwark of American liberty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE VESTAL VIRGINS.

The historian tells us that in Rome, the preservation of fire was given a sacred office and that the vestal virgins were consecrated to the service. Winter and summer, year in and year out, they guarded the sacred flame. The Roman legions might be encamped upon the river Rhine or forming battle line along the distant Euphrates, back in the temple at Rome burned the eternal fire. Mr. Speaker, so long as the vestals kept vigil in the temple, all was well with the Roman Empire. From their sacred office, there radiated a power and an influence that kept citizen and soldier with heads erect and light upon their faces, and spreading contentment everywhere. But in an evil hour the tempter came. The vestals left the temple and the sacred flame went out. Faith in the Government and the spirit and lofty ideals that once characterized the people of Rome were gone, and with them went the spirit and moral stamina of citizen and soldier, and Rome fell down among her beautiful hills and died.

SUPREME COURT JUDGES IN THE TEMPLE.

Mr. Speaker, in building this Republic, our fathers gave to the Supreme Court a sacred office. They dedicated it to the cause of liberty and kindled upon its sacred altar the white fires of eternal justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They consecrated our Supreme Court Judges to service in the temple. And winter and summer, year in and year out they have guarded the sacred flame. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The waves of party strife and bitterness have beat against the legislative and executive branches of the Government, but beyond the sound of the breakers, and beyond the reach of the waves has stood in solemn grandeur this

American temple of justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So long as it was free from politics and our justices kept vigil in the temple all was well with the Republic. The humblest citizen, the high and the low, the rich and the poor looked with implicit faith upon this temple as the very seat and home of justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This fidelity to duty on the part of the judge, and this abiding faith on the part of the citizen has been the inspiring power that has kept the light of justice forever burning in the temple and held the respect and confidence of the American people through all the years that are gone. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

SENATOR WORKS, OF CALIFORNIA.

Senator WORKS, a Republican, of California, a great lawyer, and one who cherishes in his heart the tradition which has kept our Supreme Court out of politics, said in the Senate of the United States, April 12, 1916:

To my mind, it is of the gravest importance that that great tribunal should be separated absolutely and forever from politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This attempt to bring the highest tribunal of the country or any member of it into politics should be resented, not only by the member to whom the tempting offer is made, but by the whole country.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Speaker, it will be resented. Patriotic judges, lawyers, and laymen will stand in solid phalanx to prevent the establishment of this dangerous precedent. [Applause.] All men, regardless of party affiliations, know in their hearts that the independent and nonpartisan character of our Supreme Court has made it the mightiest force for good in this Government. [Applause.] Every man who hears me to-day knows that if ever a Supreme Court judge is elected President that the precedent for opening that court to partisan politics has been established and that that precedent would violate the sanctity and impair the usefulness of the highest court in the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That court of last resort, from whose decision there is no appeal, has been and in the future ought to be purely and wholly a tribunal of justice unhampered and unimpaired by political influences from without or partisan ambition from within. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

CLASHING CREEDS AND WARRING INTERESTS.

Mr. Speaker, above clashing creeds and warring interests, beyond the fret and the fever, the strife and the bitterness of partisan conflicts, sits this court with singleness of purpose, unswerving eye and steady hand holding aloft the eternal principles of justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As the crusaders fought to recover the holy sepulcher from the hands of infidels, I call upon the American crusader of to-day to fight with the same zeal and determination to protect our temple of justice against those who would debauch and defile it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] God of our fathers forbid that we shall ever prove recreant in our obligations to protect and preserve it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ITS EXALTED MISSION.

This sacred custom has become a fixed principle with our people. It is as old as the 13 stripes in our flag, and its splendor is reflected in every star that beams in the blue of Old Glory. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has blessed and benefited our people everywhere. It is vital to the happiness and well-being of a hundred millions of people, and it is necessary to the perpetuity of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let every patriot in the country declare once and for all that this temple of justice shall never become a political incubator to hatch out candidates for the office of President [applause on the Democratic side], but that it shall remain now and forever true to the purpose of its creation and consecrated to its exalted mission. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name and invoke Thy blessing upon us as we address ourselves to the tasks of this day. We come to Thee lest we should lose the least opportunity to serve our fellow men. We come to Thee lest we should neglect to use the greatest power that Thou hast committed to us in this same service. This day may we be directed by Thy grace in the performance of the duties that are before us, and at its close may we have the comfortable satisfaction of having done our best to aid the world to higher and richer and nobler things. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have received from the moderator and stated clerk of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States a letter requesting that I present a petition of the General Assembly to the Senate. It is a short address, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

[General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.]

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,
July 31, 1916.

To the Senate of the United States:

JOHN A. MARQUIS, Moderator.
W. H. ROBERTS, Stated Clerk.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from William H. Campbell, of New York, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WORKS. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Pacific Coast Steamship Co., protesting against certain provisions in the shipping bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 4.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This company, operating American-built vessels in the coastwise trade on the Pacific coast, respectfully but most earnestly protests against section 9 of House bill 15455 as reported by the committee to the Senate, permitting foreign-built vessels to engage in the United States coastwise trade. This company and the other regular coastwise lines have built up their trade at great expense and are giving a high-class service on regular schedule at low rates, not only with suitable cargo steamers but also with combination passenger and freight steamers, thereby furnishing a facility greatly needed by the traveling public. It would work a great hardship and a grave injustice upon these lines and tend to destroy their passenger and freight service to subject them to the competition of these cheaper built and cheaper operated foreign freighters, for the present increased selling prices and building costs of foreign vessels are undoubtedly merely a passing phase of the extraordinary conditions temporarily existing because of the war. Such vessels when in the foreign trade—and presumably the same privilege would be granted them when engaged in both the foreign and coastwise trade—could employ under the Executive order of September 4, 1914, foreign-licensed officers and would not be subject to either United States inspection or measurement when trading foreign at rates relatively much higher than the coastwise rates; and, calling at two or more American ports, these steamers could afford, whenever having unfilled space, to carry freight between such American ports at abnormally low rates, with which the American coastwise steamers depending exclusively on coastwise business could not compete. There is now ample American-built tonnage to promptly and satisfactorily handle all traffic now offered or likely to offer in the direct coastwise trade also in the intercoastal trade, as soon as the offshore rates become normal. Moreover, the recent testimony of the Commissioner of Navigation before the committee shows that to-day there are building in American yards 372 steamers, aggregating 1,147,534 gross tons, equivalent to over 18 per cent of all the present tonnage in the coastwise trade, and there can be no doubt that a large percentage of this new tonnage and of the heavy additional tonnage that will undoubtedly be constructed will eventually find its way into the coastwise and intercoastal trade. What element, therefore, of necessity, of justice, or of prudence is there in permitting these foreign-built vessels or other vessels acquired under this act to invade the coastwise trade that now almost everywhere has to meet the competition of railroads and the constantly increasing expenses of operation, with practically no opportunity, because of competition already existing, for any corresponding permanent increase in rates? May we not ask you to lend your best efforts to have section 9 so amended as to exclude not only foreign-built vessels but all vessels acquired under this act from the coastwise trade, thereby maintaining our traditional governmental policy under which our coastal fleet has grown to be the largest in the world?

MATTHEW C. BUTLER, JR.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6740) to correct the military record of Matthew C. Butler, jr., and I submit a report (No. 762) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the report.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Matthew C. Butler, jr., deceased, who was a major in the Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, and who was nominated by the President for appointment as lieutenant colonel of Cavalry, to rank from the 1st day of July, 1916, said nomination being confirmed by the Senate before the death of said Butler, which occurred on the 20th day of July, 1916, before the issue to him of a commission evidencing his advancement, shall hereafter be held and considered to have become a lieutenant colonel of Cavalry in the service of the United States on the 1st day of July, 1916, and to have held that office until the date of his death; and the President is hereby authorized to issue a commission as lieutenant colonel of Cavalry in the name of Matthew C. Butler, jr., with rank to date from July 1, 1916.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the proceeding proposed in this bill has been the course pursued in other cases where an officer of the United States has died or been killed after he was nominated but before his commission was issued. In the last Congress I observed the case of Capt. Hains, in whose behalf a bill was enacted some time in 1915. Capt. Hains was promoted to the rank of major, but before the Senate acted upon that nomination, and, of course, before the commission issued, he died, and relief was granted similar to that which is proposed in this bill, which is for the benefit of the officer's wife and infant child. Maj. Butler left a wife and a child of tender years residing in my State. Maj. Butler left a splendid record behind him, and his death was a loss to the service. The bill is meritorious, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not my present purpose to object to the immediate consideration of the bill, but I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee, as the bill is somewhat involved, when was this promotion to take effect?

Mr. SHIELDS. On July 1.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. When was the officer to become a lieutenant colonel? That is what I am trying to ascertain.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will explain. Maj. Butler was entitled to this promotion under the recent act passed in June in regard to the personnel of the Army. The President sent his nomination to the Senate in accordance with the statute. As I understand, his promotion was to take effect as of the 1st day of July. The Senate confirmed the nomination, but he was shot before his commission was signed and issued. With that statement of the facts, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE RURAL-CREDITS ACT (S. DOC. NO. 524).

Mr. POMERENE. I have before me a copy of an address delivered before the Ohio State Bar Association at Sandusky, Ohio, July 6, 1916, by the distinguished junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on the subject of the rural-credits act. It discusses not only the provisions of the act, but especially the constitutionality of that act. I think it would be a matter of very great interest to all who are interested in this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear who the author of the article is.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, recently a very important action was decided in the district court of the Canal Zone, Balboa division, relating to the salary and expenses of William H. Jackson as district judge of the Canal Zone.

The opinion was delivered by Judge Clayton, of Alabama, who was designated to go to the Canal Zone and hear the case. The opinion is a judicial construction of what might be called the organic act of the Canal Zone, and it is one of great importance. The questions involved are treated with great ability, and I am satisfied that the information if put in convenient form would be widely read and would be very valuable, especially to Members of Congress in considering similar questions. I ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if I am not mistaken it has already been printed. I ask the Senator, further, to have it referred to the Committee on Printing and see whether it was not printed in the House. I think it was printed in the House.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that it was printed as a public document. It was printed in the Record.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if it has been printed in the Record I object to its being printed as a public document.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION AGREEMENTS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed as a public document a letter written by Mr. Oscar T. Crosby. I wish to state that Mr. Crosby is a graduate of the West Point Military Academy, and he is very much interested in all questions with relation to arbitration agreements between nations. It was at his instance that I introduced an amendment to the naval appropriation bill which provided for disarmament in the event that arbitration agreements were entered into between the nations of the world. That amendment was incorporated in the naval appropriation bill.

I introduced another amendment with relation to amending the Constitution so that a certain amount of sovereignty could be yielded by all nations that entered into an agreement by which a court to enforce its decrees could be established among the nations of the earth. Mr. Crosby has written a very able letter explaining the reasons why, in his judgment, that ought to be done. He is a very able writer, and I ask unanimous consent that this letter be made a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. In accordance with the notice I gave some time ago, I object to the printing of it as a public document unless it is first referred to the Committee on Printing and they pass upon it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, I ask that the letter may go with the resolution which it purports to explain to the Committee on Printing for the purpose of having it made a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator whether any estimate has been made as to the cost of the printing?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it consists of only nine pages.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let it go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The cost would be quite small.

DISTRICT EXCISE BOARD.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a few days ago I discussed the excise conditions in the District of Columbia. I stated that some charges had been made against Mr. Cummings, who had been lately appointed by the President as a member of the excise board, and that, if those charges were true, they were sufficient to warrant his rejection by the Senate. Such investigation as has been possible has been made; and in view of the statement I made the other day, I think it but fair that I should state in the open Senate that those making such charges have not furnished ample evidence of the truth of the charges; at least not sufficient has been found to warrant further opposition to his confirmation, as I do not think the Senate would reject him upon the evidence available.

Mr. Cummings is not the sort of man who, I think, ought to have been nominated for this position, but under the circumstances I feel that further opposition would not be justified.

Furthermore, Mr. Cummings has made every assurance that a man could make that in the administration of this law he will administer the spirit and letter of it in the interest of morality, temperance, and good citizenship in the District of Columbia. For these reasons I shall myself not interpose further objection to his confirmation. I hope he will make good. If he does, there will be no opposition to his reappointment. If he does not make good, it will be his own fault, and if his course does not meet with the approval of the moral forces of this District he alone will be to blame.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall occupy a few minutes in the discussion of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

TONNAGE DUTIES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on March 16 of this year I submitted a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish certain information with reference to discriminating tonnage duties which have been paid. I do not know whether or not the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury has been called to the resolution. At any rate, no response, as I understand, has been made to the Senate. It seems to me that a resolution of the Senate passed last March ought to have had attention by the Treasury Department; and I simply want to say that if the officers of the Senate whose duty it would be to advise the Secretary of the passage of the resolution have not done so, I hope they will do it immediately.

CONCENTRATION AND MANEUVER CAMP IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on the calendar day of May 26 [legislative day of May 18] a resolution was also passed directing the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain papers to the Senate. No response, apparently, has been made to that resolution. I do not know whether or not the officers of the Senate have called the attention of the Secretary of War to that resolution; but, if they have not done so, I hope that that will be done promptly, because it seems to me that two or three months is sufficient time to make copies of a few papers which the Senate desires for its information.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4654) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 4, 6, 9, 10, 12, 13, 16, 17, 19, 22, 23, 24.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 5, 8, 11, 14, 18, 20, 21, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount named, insert "$24"; and the House agree to the same.

"The name of Dennie Dixon, late of Company L, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out insert the following:

"The name of Williamson S. Wright, late first lieutenant Fourteenth Company United States Volunteer Signal Corps, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

And the House agree to the same.

T. TAGGART,
REED SMOOT,

EDWARD KEATING,
CARL VINSON,
SAM R. SELLS,

The report was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5914) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out, insert the following:

"The name of Lillias E. Knapp, widow of John J. Knapp, late captain, United States Navy, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

And the House agree to the same.

REED SMOOT,

CARL VINSON,

SAM R. SELLS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15048) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

CHARLOTTE M. JOHNSTON.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7883) for the relief of Charlotte M. Johnston.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope we will be able to take up the calendar where we left off when it was last under consideration.

Mr. WORKS. I have been hoping so for some time, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was about to ask unanimous consent to consider the calendar.

Mr. WORKS. This is a very urgent matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are a great many urgent bills on the calendar.

Mr. WORKS. In this case the son of the old lady who is the beneficiary of the bill was postmaster at a little town near the Mexican line. The post office was raided by bandits, and he was shot and killed. His mother is in need. I have been patiently waiting to have this bill considered, and I think it is a matter that can be disposed of in a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I can get an opportunity to do so, I will ask that the calendar be taken up commencing with Order of Business No. 593, where we left off when it was last under consideration, and then the bill to which the Senator from California refers will be reached in a few moments.

Mr. WORKS. It will take no more time to act upon it now than it will then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not object to the Senator's bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7883) for the relief of Charlotte M. Johnston. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $1,000 to Charlotte M. Johnston, mother of Frank Volney Johnston, postmaster at Tecate, Cal., border line of Mexico, who was killed in the discharge of his duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF CIVIL-WAR SOLDIERS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11707) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the pension of widows, minor children, and so forth, of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War, the War with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and so forth, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War," approved April 19, 1908, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, morning business has not been closed as I understand. I did not hear the Chair so announce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has not yet been closed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object to the consideration of this bill. One objection carries it over, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further resolutions? [A pause.] If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I renew my motion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of House bill 11707, to increase pensions, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand the motion is not debatable; so I can not urge my suggestion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine. [Putting the question.] The Chair can not decide the question on a vote of that kind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask for a division.

After a division the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11707) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War, the War with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War," approved April 19, 1908, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. THOMAS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Friday, Aug. 4, 1916.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have paid close attention, and have listened with much interest, to the discussion of this very important subject. It is involved in considerable difficulty. Consequently I have been anxious to secure as much information as possible regarding both the purpose of the bill and the power of Congress to legislate upon the subject. So the discussions which thus far have taken place have been both interesting and illuminating. At the same time they have increased my difficulties.

Mr. President, as regards our inherent power under the Constitution I very much question whether we have the authority to enact this and kindred subjects of legislation. On the other hand, if we are to take several decisions of the Supreme Court, which recognize progressive extensions of the power of Congress over legislation, and then assume that this progress will continue, I must concede that, in all probability, the legislation will be sustained. In other words, the constitutional arguments against our power to enact this legislation are most convincing. But the attitude of the Supreme Court, especially in its recent decisions concerning the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, leads me to believe that it will sustain this bill. Between these two situations I hesitate, and the more so because the party with which I affiliate in its recent declaration of faith has indorsed this identical bill. The Republican platform contains a similar declaration; so that from the attitude of the two great national parties upon the subject, it may be considered as a closed one. Both parties are pledged to the enactment of child-labor legislation, and good party men on both sides upon the face of things will be expected to observe these party obligations and to discharge them as best they can. So, with the party declarations and the trend of the Supreme Court decisions upon the one hand, and my own view of the constitutional power of Congress over the subject upon the other, I may take refuge in the not very creditable course of not voting at all, a course to which I am unaccustomed and which does not commend itself either to my judgment or to my sense of duty.

Mr. President, in the short time that I shall detain the Senate in the discussion of the bill itself I shall endeavor to give some of the reasons which convince me of our constitutional inability to enact this law. The bill provides:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity the product of any mine or quarry, situated in the United States, in which, within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom, children under the age of 16 years have been employed or permitted to work—

And so forth.

And the authority which is invoked by some for this legislation is the well-known interstate commerce clause of the Constitution and by others the national police power incidental to that clause.

Mr. President, I think it is safe to say that the great proportion of power in legislation which is exercised in latter days by Congress finds its support under that provision of the Constitution. Since the organization of the Government our commerce has increased enormously, not only in volume, but in character. We are the greatest commercial Nation in the world. We have the largest export and import trade in the world; and yet that trade is only about 5 per cent of our intrastate commerce, the enormity of which can be faintly imagined from that statement. Of course, as this commerce has grown diversified and extended, the importance of the interstate commerce clause has been equally expansive, and, as the powers of Congress have been exercised in meeting emergencies and new conditions, it is not at all surprising that so much of our authority and so much of our legislation finds shelter under the provisions of that very simple clause of the Constitution.

I think, Mr. President, it has been unduly extended. If you take that clause, together with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, you have practically everything under and through which constant and continued invasions by the Nation upon the power of the States have been carried on, the one through an actual extension of power, and the other through the extension of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. If the policy continues, which seems entirely probable, it is my humble conviction that in the course of a quarter of a century the States will become provinces, and their original rights, or rather those rights which were not expressly or by necessary incidence granted to the Government of the United States, will have practically been absorbed by the central authority.

Take, for illustration, the modern jurisdiction of the National Government over the watercourses of the country. Since the case of Gibbons v. Ogden the authority of the Federal Government has steadily and inexorably marched from the tidewaters to the very sources of all the streams of the Nation; so that today the Secretary of War has greater jurisdiction over the headwaters, however insignificant, of the great rivers of the country than the States in whose boundaries those headwaters are found, and all upon the assumption that for the purposes of navigation and in the interest of interstate commerce this control has become essential.

It is the same, Mr. President, in many other directions to which it is not necessary to refer. This extension and expansion of authority and of jurisdiction, frequently challenged in Congress, and sometimes by the Supreme Court, has been one of practically constant progression. Macaulay, in one of his essays referring to the constant growth and progress of the development of free institutions in England compares it to the incoming of the tides. A wave will advance a little beyond the one preceding it, then seems to recede farther; yet the next reaches a little beyond its immediate predecessor, and so on till flood tide is reached. The extension of the Federal power to which I am calling attention may be similarly illustrated.

It was, perhaps, inevitable that the National Government should increase its activities, and therefore its power, that it might properly discharge its supreme functions. But, Mr. President, another cause has powerfully contributed to this expansion, and that is the constant surrender by the States of first one and then another and yet another function in exchange for appropriations from the National Treasury. I do not know of any right so sacred, I do not know of any sovereign function, the invasion of which 50 or 60 years ago would have been defended with all vigor of the States whose right was imperiled, that has not been or can not in these days be exchanged for adequate appropriations, in the making and distribution of which the National Government takes them over. Having once assumed them, it continues their exercise, and, of course, the appropriations required for their exercise continue. So, Mr. President, by this practice, coupled with laws for the regulation of commerce, the decisions of the Supreme Court—beginning with the original-package case—and changing commercial conditions resulting from first one and then another development, it is confidently and ably contended by distinguished Senators that we may not only regulate commerce between the States but as well the methods of its production. They will do this successfully, for parties have been convinced and so the Senate will unquestionably pass this measure. Every Senator voting for it will do so with the sincere conviction, justified by these decisions, that the subject is entirely within the power of Congress.

We have had, commencing with the so-called Lottery case, and which was the exercise of a very questionable power, apparently essential to doing away with a great national evil, and which seemed at the time to be an undue extension of the authority of Congress under the commerce clause, down to the decision of Hoke against the United States, where an act aimed at an unquestioned evil, prohibiting under severe penalties the use of the transportation agencies in interstate commerce for the conveyance of women from one State to another for immoral purposes, which was sustained by the Supreme Court by a line of reasoning which logically, to my mind, leads to the contentions of the Senator from Idaho; and, of course, it is upon the doctrine of that decision and similar ones that this bill was framed and upon which it is defended.

I quite agree with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGE] that it is not fair, either to ourselves or to the country or to the Supreme Court of the United States, that we, as a legislative body, should pass some doubtful proposition up to the Supreme Court as an easy alternative to the assumption by ourselves of the responsibility of saying that we do not believe we have the power to dispose of it; but the practice spreads all over the country. It infects the State legislatures as well as the Congress; and I fear, Mr. President, that it will continue, since it offers an easy means of complying with pressure in one direction and avoiding the direct and positive expression of our convictions in the other. I do not reflect upon any man supporting this bill, because, as I have stated, my conviction is that every vote cast in favor of this bill will be cast by Senators who are thoroughly convinced of the need for it and the power of Congress to enact it. But I perceive a fundamental difference between the purpose sought to be effected by this bill and that sought to be accomplished by preceding legislation.

This bill proposes to prohibit the channels of interstate commerce to articles perfectly unobjectionable in themselves, entirely free from any taint, not inimical to the health, the morals, or the welfare of the Nation, not differing from other articles of similar character manufactured by other forms of labor, but because they are produced by a class of labor the use of which Congress proposes to prohibit because the general welfare demands it. In other words, it is not the thing transported that is offensive; it is the manner in which the thing transported has been produced that is offensive, and because of which the embargo of prohibitive Federal legislation is to be laid upon the articles themselves. The Government in effect proposes to use this great power of regulating interstate commerce to boycott and blacklist articles which are unobjectionable, per se, in order to enforce what seems to be, what is claimed to be, a national labor requirement deemed requisite to the welfare or the morals or the health of the Nation or to all of them.

Mr. President, it may be we possess this power; but if we do, then I am unable to perceive any limitation beyond congressional discretion that can be placed upon its exercise. It is defended as the exercise of a national police power—a power said to be inherent in and incidental to the exercise of those other powers which are expressly conferred, and about which our authority is beyond question.

Speaking broadly, I think there is no such thing as a national police power. Of course, there may be, in the carrying out of a given authority, an incidental police power essential to the operation of the express authority; the possession of a power, in other words, measured and limited by the thing to which it is incidental.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is not that a grant of power, rather than the police power?

Mr. THOMAS. It must be a grant of power, of course; though not an express one; but, if it is a necessary incident, to the extent to which it is necessary, I think there can be no question of its exercise. But what is this police power? If the contention for it be sound, the incidental police power is far greater and more formidable than the express commerce power from which it springs.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] read from a recent decision by Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the entire court, to the effect that the police power must be regulated by public sentiment, and that it extends to all public needs. Of course, it is a power which can not be specifically defined. In the consideration of the Clayton antitrust bill the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] demonstrated to my satisfaction, and with the most remorseless logic, that the only term which could be safely used in the legislation there proposed was the general term "unfair competition"; and so with the proposed definition, or any attempted definition, of the police power. The police power, in other words, is something which comes into existence and must be commensurate with the thing at which it is aimed. In other words, as Mr. Justice Holmes said, it extends to all public needs.

Now, what is public need, and what is public sentiment? It must be which at the time controls. If it be true that such legislation as this is only justified by an incidental police power of the National Government consequent upon its possession of certain well-defined powers, and if it be further true that this police power extends to all public needs and is regulated by public sentiment, then, of course, the power changes with the public needs and with the public sentiment; and that which is to-day an overwhelming public sentiment or an obvious public need may be to-morrow something either forgotten or discarded or succeeded by some other overwhelming sentiment reaching in some other direction and prompted by some other need.

They have a Japanese problem out in California, said to be one which menaces the morals, the health, and the welfare of the people of the United States, and particularly of California. The competition of the oriental with the American is said to be exhaustive and overwhelming. The moral notions, practices, and customs of the oriental are degrading to the mind and to the sentiment of the American; not only so, but immoral in themselves, and consequently it is a public need that the alien people should be excluded. If that be so, then the question should be easy of solution, provided this proposed legislation be within the power of Congress, by merely providing that hereafter articles manufactured by or to which there has been a contribution of manufacture in whole or in part by Japanese labor shall be excluded from the channels of interstate commerce. In other words, the oriental Gordian knot can be cut, not by an immigration law but by merely translating into law the police power of the Government of the United States which arises from and is coincident with our power to regulate commerce.

Mr. President, there are an infinite number of subjects to which public sentiment relates and around which it sometimes gathers in overwhelming volume. There is and has been for some time, I will not say a contest, but friction between organized and unorganized labor. Organized labor never speaks of unorganized labor during their controversies, at least, in any but terms of reproach, and doubtless the feeling is reciprocal. I do not know. But suppose organized labor becomes so strong in this country as to dominate the national sentiment and demand the exercise of the police power in excluding from the channels of interstate commerce all articles manufactured in whole or in part by unorganized labor. We would then have a bill reading:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity, the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States, in which, within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom, unorganized labor has been employed or permitted to work—

And so forth.

If public sentiment be in favor of it, the public need will require it, and the police power which springs from and is regulated by that sentiment is behind the legislation needed for its enforcement. Now, how can it be possible to distinguish between that which is before us and that which I have supposed?

Now, let us further suppose that the sentiment may be the other way; that it will become adverse to organized labor and in favor of unorganized labor, and that sentiment therefore demands a reversal of the proposition. Then a bill may be introduced reading:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity, the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States, in which, within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom, organized labor has been employed.

Suppose that in the interest of morals and the public welfare—which may be as indefinable as the police power—Congress is called upon to enact such a measure of legislation. It could be defended, it would be defended, nay, it could be consummated along the same lines upon which this bill has been so ably defended.

But, Mr. President, there have been such things in the past as ostracism for religious beliefs. This sort of fanaticism has not entirely passed away. It appears sometimes in fitful flashes, and sometimes in more formidable shape in these times, and frequently is well organized. Something of the kind exists in the country to-day. Suppose that a sentiment prevailed in some parts of the country against Catholicism which seriously believed that it was a menace to the institutions of our country, and that all those professing it owed a higher allegiance to the Pope than the Government of which they were citizens, and that to rid ourselves of that menace a bill should be offered—

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States in which, within 30 days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom, Catholics have been employed or permitted to work.

Here again we might have a controlling sentiment behind the measure which, as I say, is both the measure and the limit of the exercise of the police power, and which, in the interest of the public welfare, would clamor for the enactment of this legislation to the end that the evil existing or apprehended may be either minimized or removed.

Now, in the mutations of time it may be that the Catholics would get the upper hand in public sentiment, and that their attitude toward the Protestants of the country would be quite as vindictive, quite as sincere, and quite as dangerous; and suppose they should invoke the power of the Nation to regulate commerce in order to do away with, or to cripple this menace to the Nation's welfare. A similar bill could be introduced and passed, Mr. President, to accomplish that purpose.

We have a great many immigrants in America. Many of them persist in "flocking together," as the saying is. They do not learn our language. They know nothing of our institutions. They are constantly competing with American labor. Some regard them as a menace now, and that feeling is by no means a local or a limited one. We have an immigration bill which is designed to meet, in part at least, that evil and remove some of its consequences, by restricting immigration and making certain tests as qualifications to entry. But the situation is here. It has been here for some time. It is drastic and it is powerful, and after the end of the war it will probably increase. Now, why do we need an immigration bill if, under the provision of the Constitution, giving us power to regulate commerce, we can exclude from shipment all articles produced by this foreign labor, by this alien population, when they contribute in whole or in part to its production?

Mr. President, I sincerely believe that the presence of these large masses of immigrants, who either decline or fail to amalgamate with the general population, who continue their aloofness, cling to their own language and their customs, and repudiate everything American, are a danger to the morals and to the welfare of the people of the United States; and I fear that this is one of the internal conditions which menace the future of this country far more seriously than any imaginary invasion by a foreign foe.

I am unable to determine, Mr. President, if we have the power that is here invoked, where we are going to draw the limit, particularly as the legislation finds its force and its warrant in the exercise of a power that must always be subservient to the public needs and to harmonize with the public sentiment of the times. If we have the power—and I have no doubt of its existence in a limited degree—and if it be the only one upon which legislation like this can be based, it is impossible to place any limitation whatever upon the legislation of Congress under the provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. President, it must not be forgotten that what Congress may enjoin it can command and that it may enforce. Consequently I see no objection, on the theory upon which this bill is to be supported, to the enactment of legislation commanding the manufacturers in the States to use certain kinds of labor, and use certain kinds of labor only, or to provide their mills with certain methods of sanitation, or to remove immoral surroundings from them, upon the peril of being excluded from the channels of transportation if the mandate is not complied with. There is no State regulation of the land having opponents in sufficient numbers who can not for that reason create a public sentiment and, by the exercise of the congressional power, supplant by national legislation practically every feature of local self-government.

Mr. President, these conclusions of mine may be entirely erroneous, but I am unable to escape them, notwithstanding, as I said, I believe the Supreme Court will sustain this sort of legislation. In one of his inimitable contributions to the humor of the last decade Dooley discussed the insular decision of the Supreme Court. Hennessey asked him if he thought the Supreme Court always followed the Constitution. Dooley said, "I don't know, but I notice they follow the elections mighty close," which is another way of saying that the court, like others, is human and largely controlled by public opinion whenever its manifestation seems to be undoubted. Consequently, the public opinion is undoubtedly behind this measure, manifested by the official announcement of both the great parties on the subject, and, founded upon a system of reasoning that has heretofore become official, will promote its passage and sustain its validity.

Mr. President, I am unable to imagine the existence of anything going into the manufacture of perfectly legitimate articles of commerce, either by way of labor or raw material, which can not be made the basis of legislation by Congress for the exclusion of such manufactures from our interstate commerce. Of course, if we control all the ramifications of interstate trade and can dictate the terms and conditions on which all articles of commerce are to be produced, then we can control intrastate trade as absolutely as though the Constitution by express enactment invested the National Government with jurisdiction over it.

This principle can perhaps be applied to a condition maintained in my own and the neighboring State of Wyoming. Under the laws of the State of Colorado no divorced person can marry until a year after the decree, but the good city of Cheyenne is only a hundred miles from Denver, and a custom has arisen whereby as soon as a decree is rendered, the law to which I referred is easily evaded by divorcees, who quietly take a train for the city of Cheyenne, where a new nuptial knot is tied and the newly wed return with safety to the old home. I do not think that practice is confined entirely to us. It prevails elsewhere. It is a bad practice; it tends to gross immorality; and it is certainly inimical to public morals.

Can not Congress destroy this evil by excluding all articles from the channels of interstate commerce manufactured by men and women whose matrimonial records are such as I have outlined? Why not? Can they not also exclude the offspring of such marriages from the lines of transportation in the exercise of their police power and in the interests of the general welfare? Why not? Where are you going to draw the line?

Under the rules of the Senate, Mr. President, we work boys as pages here 12 and 13 hours sometimes. I do not suppose we shall enact legislation against ourselves, but is not that a transgression as well of the principles contended for here which requires legislation for its correction?

Mr. President, I believe I have as great sympathy for the abuses of child labor as any man in this country. I know they exist in many places. I want it to cease. I know that children have been exploited and abused, and after the enactment of this law they will still be exploited by mercenary employers, sometimes by parents, in a manner shocking to the humane sentiment of every well-constituted man and woman. It is deleterious to the health of the child and certainly opposed to the general welfare and morality.

The same is true of adults, and in a less degree perhaps than it used to be in regard to women in the United States. With the exception, I think, of two, every State in the Union has its child-labor laws, and they ought to be enforced, and because they are not enforced, or because it is said they are enforced only here and there, partially enforced, possibly not enforced at all at times, a national scheme of legislation is deemed essential.

Mr. President, if that be true, then many State enactments, equally faulty and equally nonsusceptible of enforcement, demand the exercise of the national authority for a similar reason. Can we afford to yield to the tendency of the Government to embrace in its all-encircling arms every power and function of government, centering them here, and administered through commissions and bureaus in manner drastic, irritating, unsuccessful, to say nothing of the enormous expense which the attempt to enforce them entails?

Mr. HARDING. May I ask the Senator, Suppose this principle is established and a factory in a State requires certain raw material from another State in order to continue business in intrastate trade, could the application of this law forbid the shipment of raw material to a factory of that sort?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that gives rise to a most interesting feature of the bill and one which had not occurred to me, but I think I can say that if the bill does not cover the suggestion, and we have the power to enact such legislation, it will be enacted.

Mr. HARDING. It is very interesting to me. It seems that if that were true Congress would have authority to confiscate the business itself, even though it were limited to intrastate commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the conclusion suggested by the Senator would inevitably follow the exercise of such an authority. I do not think Congress has that power, but I do not see how we can escape from its exercise if Congress sees fit to do so, if the proposed legislation is in our power to enact. I can see how this measure and kindred measures might by their operation have just the result that the Senator suggested. I do not know that the inhibition of child labor in factories would cripple some of them, but I can see how the application of the principle to other features of the industrial system would have precisely that result, and some of them I have attempted to use by way of illustration.

Now, Mr. President, I have said upon that subject more than I perhaps intended to say. My real purpose in taking the floor was to discuss an amendment which I submitted this morning and whose insertion into this measure, should it be passed, I think is of great importance.

Saturday, August 5, 1916.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at the time of the adjournment of the Senate yesterday I was discussing some features of the child-labor bill and had reached a point where it seemed appropriate to present my reasons for offering an amendment to that measure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he will not defer his speech on the child-labor bill until the pending bill granting pensions to the widows of Spanish-American War veterans has been disposed of? It can be acted upon very quickly, I am sure.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President, I can not do that for two reasons, one being my necessary attendance upon the meeting of the majority members of the Finance Committee at an early hour, and the other being the fact that objection would be made to the consideration of that bill in any event by other Senators. The first, however, is the controlling reason why I am unable to yield the floor, and must insist upon finishing my remarks on the child-labor bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I further suggest that my reason for making the request is that the Senate has already expressed its desire to consider this particular bill by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, let me, before the Senator from Colorado proceeds further, suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he is mistaken as to the bill which the Senator from Maine has moved to take up. It is a bill which relates to the increase of pensions of the widows of veterans of the Civil War of 70 years of age and over.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if this were a bill having nothing whatever to do with pensions I should feel obliged, under the circumstances which I have mentioned, to proceed with my remarks upon the subject before the Senate as the unfinished business. The amendment which I have introduced reads as follows:

On page 5, line 24, after the word "meridian," strike out the colon and insert a comma and the following words: "or any article or commodity the product of any farm which is the material for the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment in the United States upon which children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work or children between the ages of 14 and 16 years have been employed or permitted to work more than 11 hours a day."

The amendment as originally prepared, Mr. President, limited the labor of children in the first instance covered by the amendment to eight hours. The change is due to the fact that many children are employed in farm work in a perfectly legitimate manner, and to limit their hours of employment to eight, instead of eleven, would seriously interfere with the manner of their employment and in no sense protect them or provide against any possible or real injury.

I take it that there is a fundamental reason for this proposed legislation, that abuses of child labor are so widespread and so extensive as to be beyond the power of the States to prevent or control, making it necessary for the activities of the General Government to extend themselves to correct, if not to eradicate, the evil. That must be the assumption, and if I do not err, Mr. President, in my estimate of the purposes of the bill, then it will fail to perform its purposes if it is not itself sufficiently broad to embrace all phases of the subject.

So far as the effect of the employment of child labor in the factories is concerned, as I said yesterday, I grant that it has led to a great many abuses in some sections of the country, and that the local or State legislation designed to remedy the evil is either ineffective in substance or inoperative through the indifference or the connivance of those who should enforce it, or both; and, if the difficulty were confined to that particular phase of child labor, then it would follow, as a matter of course, that the bill as drawn is sufficiently comprehensive to include and, therefore, to provide against it.

Mr. President, I do not admit that the abuses of child labor are confined to the mill and the factory. On the contrary, I challenge the assertion. There are departments of industry where the same evil is painfully apparent, if the information which has come to me is at all reliable. I had occasion to call attention to this subject during the discussion of the bill which provided for the repeal of the provision of the Underwood tariff law placing sugar upon the free list on the 1st of May, 1916.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President—

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. If the Senator will yield to me, I should like to ask if he will not defer his speech upon the child-labor bill until that is reached, after the close of the morning hour?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would do almost anything to accommodate my friend the Senator from Maine; but, as stated before, the engagements which I have in committee work are such that I must either neglect that work or finish my remarks at present. I do not propose to neglect it if I can help it; and if the Senator will bear with me, I think I will get through a great deal quicker if uninterrupted than if these requests are renewed.

On that occasion, Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate to an article in the Rocky Mountain News published on the 12th of March, 1916, entitled "Labor in fields retards pupils. Child-labor committee report estimates 5,000 children work in beet industry."

The Rocky Mountain News under its present management is Republican in politics. It is a champion of what are known as the beet-sugar interests. It has, therefore, no motive of a partisan character in giving to the public the information to which I shall now address myself. I think I have the right to assume its accuracy for the additional reason that I presented it to the consideration of the Senate on the 10th of April, since which time I have seen no refutation of it in the press and have heard none upon the floor of this Chamber.

The article reads as follows:

Five thousand children are reported to be working in the beet fields of Colorado during the growing season of each year, according to figures given out last week by the national child-labor committee. School-teachers and the national child-labor committee, as well as other authorities, have been gathering information on this subject for some years, a part of which has been made into reports.

The committee declares that the children are overworked in the fields, so much so that their progress in their studies is seriously hampered.

The children are used principally in caring for the beets while they are growing. The farmer who contracts with the beet-sugar factory to grow a certain number of acres is told that he must place a proportionate number of persons upon the tract. If he has 20 acres, he will require a certain number of laborers; if 40 acres, he must have twice the number. The work of thinning, cultivating, topping and irrigating the beets is done by contract, the head of a family being paid a certain price per acre—from $18 to $20—for the work.

The first subhead of the article is:

Six-year-old children work.

Six-year-old children work! Children of half the age which is fixed as the limitation upon child labor in this bill.

Russian men usually contract to do the work, and when the farmer looks about for some one to engage for the summer, he inquires for a family with the number of members to correspond with that required for the work. Ordinarily the contract is made for a father, mother, and children to make up the required number.

The age of the children is said to be taken into consideration under the contract, and those of tender years are not expected to do any of the field work. But the real working of the system is declared, both by teachers in the Denver public-schools and by others who have investigated the matter, to be that the children of 6 years are sent into the fields. Those from 8 to 10 are said to be employed constantly during the weeding, thinning, and topping seasons.

An investigator states that he had found the practice has been for work to commence in the fields as early as 3 o'clock in the morning, when the first sign of day begins to peep in from the east.

At that high altitude the temperature in the early morning is very low in the spring and, comparatively speaking, very low during the summer months. Consequently, the altitude is itself very unpropitious to the health of the child, to say nothing of the fact that his sleep is disturbed and his rest interfered with at an hour when it is most beneficial to him.

The next subhead is:

SEVENTEEN HOURS OF LABOR.

At 7 o'clock the workers have breakfast, sometimes going to the "Russian house" for it and sometimes it being served in the fields, so that the labor does not cease. Again at noon the workers are fed in the same way, being allowed a half hour for that purpose. They take their supper at about 6 o'clock and return to their labors, staying out in the fields until 8 o'clock at night, or even later.

From 3 o'clock in the morning until 8 o'clock at night embraces a labor period which the most stalwart workman can not very long endure.

I proceed with the reading:

The average hours of work for children in the fields is declared to be about 17 during the busiest seasons.

One abuse of the system that investigators say they have discovered results in a charge of peonage.

Here, Mr. President, is a dual evil, the one being the consequence of the other.

The article proceeds:

This is that if the family desiring to take a contract for the handling of the beets upon a farm is not as large as required under the rules, the head of the house hires children from other families.

Now, Mr. President, it will be observed that this is not a system of work where the children of farmers and farm owners are engaged, and who would naturally be protected by the love and affection of the employer. It is a system of contract work. The beet-sugar companies keep knowledge of, if indeed they do not constantly employ, large numbers of people in order to furnish them to the farmers as they may need work in the more drastic and strenuous stages of beet growing; and consequently these are furnished by contract through the agency of the companies, directly or indirectly.

The article proceeds:

Sometimes the farmer does the managing himself, hiring men, women, and children to do the actual labor.

I am told that is only occasionally. When that is done, there is no danger to the child. When that is done, the maximum fixed by the amendment I have proposed is ample for the purposes of the employer and for the benefit of the employed. It is the contract system which is now the subject of censure, and at which this amendment is aimed.

The article proceeds:

The work of thinning and weeding is done on the knees, usually in soil that was irrigated the day before or maybe only a few hours before, and is wet and cold.
